IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

January 18, 1913.

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to have compiled and printed as a document a revised edition of the document entitled "Compilation of Senate Election Cases," bringing the same down to the close of the Sixty-second Congress.

Attest:

CHARLES G. BENNETT, Secretary.

PREFACE.

The first compilation of strictly Senate election cases, as distinguished from previous compilations containing cases arising in both branches of Congress, was made by George S. Taft in 1885 and covered the Senate cases from 1789 to December, 1885. This work was continued with such changes as were adopted from time to time with the purpose of increasing the value of the work as a book of reference by George P. Furber, to March 3, 1893; by George M. Buck, to March 3, 1903; and by Charles A. Webb and Herbert R. Pierce to March 3, 1913.

The work contains not only contested cases, strictly speaking, but all cases in which the right to a seat of any person who has presented credentials has been questioned in such a manner that the Senate has deemed proper to investigate or to discuss the question. It does not, however, contain cases in which the mere form of a credential has been casually criticized with no idea of questioning the validity of the election or appointment.

The cases are presented in chronological order under three headings: "Cases concerning the power of executives of States to fill vacancies," "Miscellaneous cases," and "Expulsion of Senators." A list of the Senators appointed by executives of States follows the cases dealt with under the first-mentioned heading.

The general plan adopted in presenting these cases has been to give the reports of committees, with views of the minority, in all cases in which there were reports; brief statements of the action taken by the Senate from day to day with references indicating the volume of the Congressional Globe or Congressional Record, and the pages which contain the full record of the proceedings; extracts from debates in those cases in which there were no reports; the full debate in some cases in which the discussions have been brief; and a headnote accompanying each case stating the points in question and the action of the Senate.

The introduction contains extracts from the debates in the Federal Convention of 1787, from the Madison Papers, relating to the election and qualification of Senators; extracts from the Constitution of the United States relating to the same; extracts from Federal laws relating to the election of Senators; and a list of all cases referred by the Senate to the Committee on Privileges and Elections on which reports have been made to the Senate. References to facilitate the location of precedents will be found in the index.

INTRODUCTION.

EXTRACTS FROM THE DEBATES IN THE FEDERAL CONVENTION.

PORTIONS OF THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF DETAIL, MADE AUGUST 6, 1787, RELATING TO THE ELECTION AND QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATORS.

ART. V.—SECT. 1. The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.

SECT. 2. The Senators shall be chosen for six years; but immediately after the first election they shall be divided, by lot, into three classes, as nearly as may be, numbered one, two, and three. The seats of the members of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year; of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year; so that a third part of the members may be chosen every second year.

SECT. 3. Every member of the Senate shall be of the age of thirty years at least; shall have been a citizen in the United States for at least four years before his election; and shall be, at the time of his election, a resident of the State for which he shall be chosen.

SECT. 4. The Senate shall choose its own President and other officers.

ART. VI.—SECT. 1. The times, and places, and manner of holding the elections of the members of each House shall be prescribed by the legislature of each State; but their provisions concerning them may, at any time, be altered by the Legislature of the United States.

SECT. 2. The Legislature of the United States shall have authority to establish such uniform qualifications of the members of each House with regard to property as to the said legislature shall seem expedient.

SECT. 3. In each House a majority of the members shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day.

SECT. 4. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

SECT. 5. Freedom of speech and debate in the legislature shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of the legislature; and the members of each House shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at Congress and in going to and returning from it.

SECT. 6. Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings; may punish its members for disorderly behavior; and may expel a member.

SECT. 7. The House of Representatives, and the Senate when it shall be acting in a legislative capacity, shall keep a journal of their proceedings; and shall, from time to time, publish them; and the yeas and nays of the members of each House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth part of the members present, be entered on the Journal.

SECT. 8. Neither House, without the consent of the other, shall adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that at which the two Houses are sitting. But this regulation shall not extend to the Senate when it shall exercise the powers mentioned in the ——— article.

SECT. 9. The members of each House shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and the members of the Senate shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any such office for one year afterwards.

SECT. 10. The members of each House shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained and paid by the State in which they shall be chosen.

DEBATES.

THURSDAY, August 9, 1787.

Article V, section 1, was then taken up.

Mr. Wilson objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the legislatures will meet so frequently. It removes the appointment too far from the people, the executives in most of the States being elected by the legislatures. As he had always thought the appointment of the executive by the legislative department wrong, so it was still more so that the executive should elect into the legislative department.

Mr. Randolph thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate. In some States the legislatures meet but once a year. As the Senate will have more power, and consist of a smaller number than the other House, vacancies there will be of more consequence. The executives might be safely trusted, he thought, with the appointment for so short a time.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It is only said that the executive may supply vacancies. When the legislative meeting happens to be near the power will not be exerted. As there will be but two members from a State vacancies may be of great moment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Senators may resign or not accept. This provision is therefore absolutely necessary.

On the question for striking out "vacancies shall be supplied by the executives"—

Pennsylvania, ay, 1; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, no, 8; Maryland, divided.

Mr. Williamson moved to insert after "vacancies shall be supplied by the executives," the words, "unless other provisions shall be made by the legislature" (of the State).

Mr. ELLSWORTH. He was willing to trust the legislature or the executive of a State, but not to give the former a discretion to refer appointments for the Senate to whom they pleased.

On the question on Mr. Williamson's motion—

Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, ay, 4; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, no, 6.

Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies," and insert the words, "happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature."

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. This is absolutely necessary; otherwise, as members chosen, into the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it will be in the power of a legislature, by appointing a man a Senator against his consent, to deprive the United States of his services.

The motion of Mr. Madison was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Randolph called for a division of the section, so as to leave a distinct question on the last words, "each member shall have one vote."

* * * * * * *

On the question on the first section, down to the last sentence—

New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, ay, 7; Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, no, 3; South Carolina, divided. (In the printed Journal, Pennsylvania, ay.)

* * * * * * *

Article V, section 2, was then taken up.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to insert, after the words, "immediately after," the following: "they shall be assembled in consequence of," which was agreed to nem. con., as was then the whole section.

Article V, section 3, was then taken up.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to insert fourteen, instead of four years' citizenship as a qualification for Senators; urging the danger of admitting strangers into our public councils.

Mr. Pinckney seconded him.

Mr. Ellsworth was opposed to the section, as discouraging meritorious aliens from emigrating to this country.

Mr. PINCKNEY. As the Senate is to have the power of making treaties and managing our foreign affairs, there is peculiar danger and impropriety in opening its doors to those who have foreign attachments. He quoted the jealousy of the Athenians on this subject, who made it death for any stranger to intrude his voice into their legislative proceedings.

Colonel Mason highly approved of the policy of the motion. Were it not that many not natives of this country had acquired great credit during the Revolution, he should be for restraining the eligibility into the Senate to natives.

Mr. Madison was not averse to some restrictions on this subject, but could never agree to the proposed amendment. He thought any restriction, however, in the Constitution, unnecessary and improper—unnecessary, because the national Legislature is to have the right of regulating naturalization, and can by virtue thereof fix different periods of residence as conditions of enjoying different privileges of citizenship; improper, because it will give a tincture of illiberality to the Constitution; because it will put it out of the power of the national Legislature, even by special acts of naturalization, to confer the full rank of citizens on meritorious strangers, and because it will discourage the most desirable class of people from emigrating to the United States. Should the proposed Constitution have the intended effect of giving stability and reputation to our Government, great numbers of respectable Europeans, men who love liberty and wish to partake its blessings, will be ready to transfer their fortunes hither. All such would feel the mortification of being marked with suspicious incapacitations, though they should not covet the public honors. He was not apprehensive that any dangerous number of strangers would be appointed by the State legislatures if they were left at liberty to do so, nor that foreign powers would make use of strangers as instruments for their purposes. Their bribes would be expended on men whose circumstances would rather stifle than excite jealousy and watchfulness in the public.

Mr. Butler was decidedly opposed to the admission of foreigners without a long residence in the country. They bring with them not only attachments to other countries, but ideas of government so distinct from ours that in every point of view they are dangerous. He acknowledged that if he himself had been called into public life within a short time after his coming to America, his foreign habits, opinions, and attachments would have rendered him an improper agent in public affairs. He mentioned the great strictness observed in Great Britain on this subject.

Dr. Franklin was not against a reasonable time, but should be very sorry to see anything like illiberality inserted in the Constitution. The people in Europe are friendly to this country. Even in the country with which we have been lately at war we have now and had during the war a great many friends, not only among the people at large, but in both houses of Parliament. In every other country in Europe all the people are our friends. We found in the course of the Revolution that many strangers served us faithfully, and that many natives took part against their country. When foreigners, after looking about for some other country in which they can obtain more happiness, give a preference to ours, it is a proof of attachment which ought to excite our confidence and affection.

Mr. Randolph did not know but it might be problematical whether emigrations to this country were, on the whole, useful, or not, but he could never agree to the motion for disabling them, for fourteen years, to participate in the public honors. He reminded the convention of the language held by our patriots during the Revolution, and the principles laid down in all our American constitutions. Many foreigners may have fixed their fortunes among us under the faith of these invitations. All persons under this description, with all others who would be affected by such a regulation, would enlist themselves under the banners of hostility to the proposed system. He would go as far as seven years, but no farther.

Mr. Wilson said he rose with feelings which were perhaps peculiar; mentioning the circumstance of his not being a native, and the possibility, if the ideas of some gentlemen should be pursued, of his being incapacitated from holding a place under the very Constitution which he had shared in the trust of making. He remarked the illiberal complexion which the motion would give to the system, and the effect which a good system would have in inviting meritorious foreigners among us, and the discouragement and mortification they must feel from the degrading discrimination now proposed. He had himself experienced this mortification. On his removal into Maryland he found himself, from defect of residence, under certain legal incapacities which never ceased to produce chagrin, though he as suredly did not desire, and would not have accepted, the offices to which they related. To be appointed to a place may be a matter of indifference. To be incapable of being appointed is a circumstance grating and mortifying.

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. The lesson we are taught is that we should be governed as much by our reason and as little by our feelings as possible. What is the language of reason on this subject? That we should not be polite at the expense of prudence. There was a moderation in all things. It is said that some tribes of Indians carried their hospitality so far as to offer to strangers their wives and daughters. Was this a proper model for us? He would admit them to his house, he would invite them to his table, would provide for them comfortable lodgings, but would not carry the complaisance so far as to bed them with his wife. He would let them worship at the same altar, but did not choose to make priests of them. He ran over the privileges which emigrants would enjoy among us, though they should be deprived of that of being eligible to the great offices of Government; observing that they exceeded the privileges allowed to foreigners in any part of the world; and that as every society, from a great nation down to a club, had the right of declaring the conditions on which new members should be admitted, there could be no room for complaint. As to those philosophical gentlemen, those citizens of the world, as they called themselves, he owned he did not wish to see any of them in our public councils. He would not trust them. The men who can shake off their attachments to their own country can never love any other. These attachments are the wholesome prejudices which uphold all governments. Admit a Frenchman into your Senate, and he would study to increase the commerce of France; an Englishman, and he will feel an equal bias in favor of that of England. It has been said that the legislatures will not choose foreigners, at least improper ones. There was no knowing what legislatures would do. Some appointments made by them proved that everything ought to be apprehended from the cabals practiced on such occasions. He mentioned the case of a foreigner who left this State in disgrace, and worked himself into an appointment from another to Congress.

On the question on the motion of Mr. Gouverneur Morris to insert fourteen in place of four years—

New Hampshire, New Jersey, South Carolina, Georgia, ay, 4; Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, no, 7.

On the question for thirteen years, moved by Mr. Gouverneur Morris, it was negatived, as above.

On ten years, moved by General Pinckney, the votes were the same.

Dr. Franklin reminded the convention that it did not follow, from an omission to insert the restriction in the Constitution, that the persons in question would be actually chosen into the legislature.

Mr. RUTLEDGE. Seven years of citizenship have been required for the House of Representatives. Surely a longer time is requisite for the Senate, which will have more power.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It is more necessary to guard the Senate in this case than the other House. Bribery and cabal can be more easily practiced in the choice of the Senate, which is to be made by the legislatures, composed of a few men, than of the House of Representatives, who will be chosen by the people.

Mr. Randall will agree to nine years, with the expectation that it will be reduced to seven, if Mr. Wilson's motion to reconsider the vote fixing seven years for the House of Representatives should produce a reduction of that period.

On the question for nine years—

New Hampshire, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, ay, 6; Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Maryland, no, 4; North Carolina, divided.

The term "resident" was struck out, and "inhabitant" inserted nem. con.

Article V, section 3, as amended, was then agreed to nem. con. (198).

Article V, section 4, was agreed to nem. con.

Article VI, section 1, was then taken up.

Mr. Madison and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out "each House," and to insert "the House of Representatives"; the right of the legislatures to regulate the times and places, &c., in the election of Senators being involved in the right of appointing them; which was disagreed to.

A division of the question being called for, it was taken on the first part down to "but their provisions concerning," &c.

The first part was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Rutledge moved to strike out the remaining part, viz, "but their provisions concerning them may at any time be altered by the Legislature of the United States." The States, they contended, could and must be relied on in such cases.

Mr. GORHAM. It would be as improper to take this power from the the national Legislature as to restrain the British Parliament from regulating the circumstances of elections, leaving this business to the counties themselves.

Mr. MADISON. The necessity of a general government supposes that the State legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local convenience or prejudices. The policy of referring the appointment of the House of Representatives to the people, and not to the legislatures of the States, supposes that the result will be somewhat influenced by the mode. This view of the question seems to decide that the legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections. These were words of great latitude. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power. Whether the electors should vote by ballot, or viva voce, should assemble at this place or that place, should be divided into districts or all meet at one place, should all vote for all the Representatives or all in a district vote for a number allotted to the district—these, and many other points, would depend on the legislatures, and might materially affect the appointments. Whenever the State legislatures had a favorite measure to carry they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed. Besides, the inequality of the representation in the legislatures of particular States would produce a like inequality in their representation in the national Legislature, as it was presumable that the counties having the power in the former case would secure it to themselves in the latter. What danger could there be in giving a controlling power to the national Legislature? Of whom was it to consist? First, of a Senate to be chosen by the State legislatures. If the latter, therefore, could be trusted, their representatives could not be dangerous. Secondly, of Representatives elected by the same people who elect the State legislatures. Surely, then, if confidence is due to the latter, it must be due to the former. It seems as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the general legislature as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their representatives in the State legislatures.

Mr. KING. If this power be not given to the national Legislature, their right of judging of the returns of their members may be frustrated. No probability has been suggested of its being abused by them. Although this scheme of erecting the General Government on the authority of the State legislatures has been fatal to the Federal establishment, it would seem as if many gentlemen still foster the dangerous ideas.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris observed that the States might make false returns, and then make no provisions for new elections.

Mr. Sherman did not know but it might be best to retain the clause, though he had himself sufficient confidence in the State legislatures.

The motion of Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Rutledge did not prevail.

The word "respectively" was inserted after the word "State."

On the motion of Mr. Read, the word "their" was struck out, and "regulations in such cases" inserted, in place of "provisions concerning them"—the clause then reading, "but regulations, in each of the foregoing cases, may, at any time, be made or altered by the Legislature of the United States." This was meant to give the national Legislature a power not only to alter the provisions of the States, but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether. Article VI, section 1, as thus amended, was agreed to nem. con. (199).

FRIDAY, August 10, 1787.

[On the question of agreeing to section 2, Article VI, the ayes were 3, the noes 7. The debate is here omitted.]

[Section 3 of Article VI was amended and agreed to. The debate is here omitted.]

Sections 4 and 5 of Article VI were then agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Madison observed that the right of expulsion (Article VI, section 6) was too important to be exercised by a bare majority of a quorum, and in emergencies of faction might be dangerously abused. He moved that "with the concurrence of two-thirds" might be inserted between "may" and "expel."

Mr. Randolph and Mr. Mason approved the idea.

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. This power may be safely trusted to a majority. To require more may produce abuses on the side of the minority. A few men, from factious motives, may keep in a member who ought to be expelled.

Mr. Carroll thought that the concurrence of two-thirds, at least, ought to be required.

On the question requiring two-thirds in cases of expelling a member, 10 States were in the affirmative; Pennsylvania, divided.

Article VI, section 6, as thus amended, was then agreed to nem. con. (202).

[Section 7 of Article VI was amended and agreed to. The debate is here omitted.]

SATURDAY, August 11, 1787.

[Section 8 of Article VI was amended and agreed to. The debate is here omitted.]

TUESDAY, August 14, 1787.

In convention.—Article VI, section 9, was taken up.

Mr. Pinckney argued that the making the members ineligible to offices was degrading to them, and the more improper as their election into the legislature implied that they had the confidence of the people; that it was inconvenient, because the Senate might be supposed to contain the fittest men. He hoped to see that body become a school of public ministers, a nursery of statesmen. That it was impolitic, because the legislature would cease to be a magnet to the first talents and abilities. He moved to postpone the section, in order to take up the following proposition, viz:

"The members of each House shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States for which they, or any others for their benefit, receive any salary, fees, or emoluments of any kind; and the acceptance of such office shall vacate their seats respectively."

General Mifflin seconded the motion.

Colonel Mason ironically proposed to strike out the whole section, as a more effectual expedient for encouraging that exotic corruption which might not otherwise thrive so well in the American soil; for completing that aristocracy which was probably in the contemplation of some among us; and for inviting into the legislative service those generous and benevolent characters who will do justice to each other's merit by carving out offices and rewards for it. In the present state of American morals and manners, few friends, it may be thought, will be lost to the plan by the opportunity of giving premiums to a mercenary and depraved ambition.

Mr. MERCER. It is a first principle in political science that whenever the rights of property are secured an aristocracy will grow out of it. Elective governments also necessarily become aristocratic, because the rulers, being few, can and will draw emoluments for themselves from the many. The governments of America will become aristocracies. They are so already. The public measures are calculated for the benefit of the governors, not of the people. The people are dissatisfied, and complain. They change their rulers, and the public measures are changed, but it is only a change of one scheme of emolument to the rulers of another. The people gain nothing by it but an addition of instability and uncertainty to their other evils. Governments can only be maintained by force or influence. The executive has not force; deprive him of influence by rendering the members of the legislature ineligible to executive offices, and he becomes a mere phantom of authority. The aristocratic part will not even let him in for a share of the plunder. The legislature must and will be composed of wealth and abilities, and the people will be governed by a junto. The executive ought to have a council, being members of both Houses. Without such an influence, the war will be between the aristocracy and the people. He wished it to be between the aristocracy and the executive. Nothing else can protect the people aginst those speculating legislatures which are now plundering them throughout the United States.

Mr. Gerry read a resolution of the legislature of Massachusetts, passed before the act of Congress recommending the convention, in which her deputies were instructed not to depart from the rotation established in the fifth article of the Confederation, nor to agree, in any case, to give to the members of Congress a capacity to hold offices under the Government. This, he said, was repealed, in consequence of the act of Congress, with which the State thought it proper to comply in an unqualified manner. The sense of the State, however, was still the same. He could not think, with Mr. Pinckney, that the disqualification was degrading. Confidence is the road to tyranny. As to ministers and ambassadors, few of them were necessary. It is the opinion of a great many that they ought to be discontinued on our part, that none may be sent among us, and that source of influence shut up. If the Senate were to appoint ambassadors, as seemed to be intended, they will multiply embassies for their own sakes. He was not so fond of those productions as to wish to establish nurseries for them. If they are once appointed, the House of Representatives will be obliged to provide salaries for them, whether they approve of the measures or not. If men will not serve in the legislature without a prospect of such offices, our situation is deplorable indeed. If our best citizens are actuated by such mercenary views, we had better choose a single despot at once. It will be more easy to satisfy the rapacity of one than of many. According to the idea of one gentleman (Mr. Mercer), our Government, it seems, is to be a government of plunder. In that case, it certainly would be prudent to have but one, rather than many, to be employed in it. We cannot be too circumspect in the formation of this system. It will be examined on all sides, and with a very suspicious eye. The people who have been so lately in arms against Great Britain for their liberties will not easily give them up. He lamented the evils existing, at present, under our governments, but imputed them to the faults of those in office, not to the people. The misdeeds of the former will produce a critical attention to the opportunities afforded by the new system to like or greater abuses. As it now stands, it is as complete an aristocracy as ever was framed. If great powers should be given to the Senate, we shall be governed in reality by a junto, as has been apprehended. He remarked that it would be very differently constituted from Congress. In the first place, there would be but two deputies from each State; in Congress there may be seven, and are generally five. In the second place, they are chosen for six years; those of Congress annually. In the third place, they are not subject to recall; those of Congress are. And, finally, in Congress nine States are necessary for all great purposes; here eight persons will suffice. Is it to be presumed that the people will ever agree to such a system? He moved to render the members of the House of Representatives, as well as of the Senate, ineligible, not only during, but for one year after the expiration of, their terms. If it should be thought that this will injure the legislature, by keeping out of it men of abilities, who are willing to serve in other offices, it may be required, as a qualification for other offices, that the candidate shall have served a certain time in the legislature.

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. Exclude the officers of the Army and Navy, and you form a band having a different interest from, and opposed to, the civil power. You stimulate them to despise and reproach those "talking lords who dare not face the foe." Let this spirit be roused at the end of a war, before your troops shall have laid down their arms, and, though the civil authority be "intrenched in parchment to the teeth," they will cut their way to it. He was against rendering the members of the legislature ineligible to offices. He was for rendering them eligible again, after having vacated their seats by accepting office. Why should we not avail ourselves of their services if the people choose to give them their confidence? There can be little danger of corruption, either among the people or the legislatures, who are to be the electors. If they say, We see their merits, we honor the men, we choose to renew our confidence in them, have they not a right to give them a preference, and can they be properly abridged of it?

Mr. Williamson introduced his opposition to the motion by referring to the question concerning "money bills." That clause, he said, was dead. Its ghost, he was afraid, would, notwithstanding, haunt us. It had been a matter of conscience with him to insist on it as long as there was hope of retaining it. He had swallowed the vote of rejection with reluctance. He could not digest it. All that was said on the other side was that the restriction was not convenient. We have now got a house of lords which is to originate money bills. To avoid another inconvenience, we are to have a whole legislature at liberty to cut out offices for one another. He thought a self-denying ordinance for ourselves would be more proper. Bad as the Constitution has been made by expunging the restriction on the Senate concerning money bills, he did not wish to make it worse by expunging the present section. He had scarcely seen a single corrupt measure in the legislature of North Carolina which could not be traced up to office-hunting.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Constitution should lay as few temptations as possible in the way of those in power. Men of abilities will increase as the country grows more populous, and as the means of education are more diffused.

Mr. PINCKNEY. No State has rendered the members of the legislature ineligible to offices. In South Carolina the judges are eligible into the legislature. It cannot be supposed, then, that the motion will be offensive to the people. If the State constitutions should be revised, he believed, restrictions of this sort would be rather diminished than multiplied.

Mr. Wilson could not approve of the section as it stood, and could not give up his judgment to any supposed objections that might arise among the people. He considered himself as acting and responsible for the welfare of millions not immediately represented in this House. He had also asked himself the serious question, what he should say to his constituents in case they should call upon him to tell them why he sacrificed his own judgment in a case where they authorized him to exercise it. Were he to own to them that he sacrificed it in order to flatter their prejudices, he should dread the retort, "Did you suppose the people of Pennsylvania had not good sense enough to receive a good government?" Under this impression, he should certainly follow his own judgment, which disapproved of the section. He would remark, in addition to the objections urged against it, that, as one branch of the Legislature was to be appointed by the legislatures of the States, the other by the people of the States—as both are to be paid by the States, and to be appointable to State offices—nothing seemed to be wanting to prostrate the national Legislature but to render its members ineligible to national offices, and by that means take away its power of attracting those talents which were necessary to give weight to the Government, and to render it useful to the people. He was far from thinking the ambition which aspired to offices of dignity and trust an ignoble or culpable one. He was sure it was not politic to regard it in that light, or to withhold from it the prospect of those rewards which might engage it in the career of public service. He observed that the State of Pennsylvania, which had gone as far as any State into the policy of fettering power, had not rendered the members of the legislature ineligible to offices of Government.

Mr. Ellsworth did not think the mere postponement of the reward would be any material discouragement of merit. Ambitious minds will serve two years, or seven years, in the legislature, for the sake of qualifying themselves for other offices. This he thought a sufficient security for obtaining the services of the ablest men in the legislature; although, whilst members, they should be ineligible to public offices. Besides, merit will be most encouraged when most impartially rewarded. If rewards are to circulate only within the legislature, merit out of it will be discouraged.

Mr. Mercer was extremely anxious on this point. What led to the appointment of this convention? The corruption and mutability of the legislative councils of the States. If the plan does not remedy these, it will not recommend itself; and we shall not be able, in our private capacities, to support and enforce it; nor will the best part of our citizens exert themselves for the purpose. It is a great mistake to suppose that the paper we are to propose will govern the United States. It is the men whom it will bring into the government, and interest in maintaining it, that are to govern them. The paper will only mark out the mode and the form. Men are the substance, and must do the business. All government must be by force or influence. It is not the King of France, but 200,000 janizaries of power, that govern that kingdom. There will be no such force here; influence, then, must be substituted; and he would ask whether this could be done if the members of the legislature should be ineligible to offices of state; whether such a disqualification would not determine all the most influential men to stay at home, and prefer appointments within their respective States.

Mr. Wilson was by no means satisfied with the answer given by Mr. Ellsworth to the argument as to the discouragement of merit. The members must either go a second time into the legislature, and disqualify themselves, or say to their constituents, "We served you before only from the mercenary view of qualifying ourselves for offices, and, having answered this purpose, we do not choose to be again elected."

Mr. Gouverneur Morris put the case of a war, and the citizen most capable of conducting it happening to be a member of the legislature. What might have been the consequence of such a regulation at the commencement, or even in the course, of the late contest for our liberties?

On the question for postponing, in order to take up Mr. Pinckney's motion, it was lost.

New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, ay, 5; Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, no, 5; Georgia, divided.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to insert, after "office," "except offices in the Army or Navy; but, in that case, their offices shall be vacated."

Mr. Broome seconds him.

Mr. Randolph had been, and should continue, uniformly opposed to the striking out of the clause, as opening a door for influence and corruption. No arguments had made any impression on him but those which related to the case of war, and a coexisting incapacity of the fittest commanders to be employed. He admitted great weight in these, and would agree to the exception proposed by Mr. Gouverneur Morris.

Mr. Butler and Mr. Pinckney urged a general postponement of Article VI, section 9, till it should be seen what powers would be vested in the Senate, when it would be more easy to judge of the expediency of allowing the officers of state to be chosen out of that body.

A general postponement was agreed to nem con. (207).

SATURDAY, September 1, 1787.

In convention.—Mr. Brearly, from the committee of eleven, to which were referred yesterday the postponed part of the Constitution, and parts of reports not acted upon, made the following partial report:

"That in lieu of Article VI, section 9, the words following be inserted, viz: 'The members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States, during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.'"

MONDAY, September 3, 1787.

Mr. Pinckney moved to postpone the report of the committee of eleven (see the 1st of September), in order to take up the following:

"The members of each House shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States for which they, or any other for their benefit, receive any salary, fees, or emoluments of any kind, and the acceptance of such office shall vacate their seats respectively."

He was strenuously opposed to an ineligibility of members to office, and, therefore, wished to restrain the proposition to a mere incompatibility. He considered the eligibility of members of the legislature to the honorable offices of government as resembling the policy of the Romans, in making the temple of Virtue the road to the temple of Fame.

On this question—

Pennsylvania, North Carolina, ay, 2; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, no, 8.

Mr. King moved to insert the word "created" before the word "during," in the report of the committee. This, he said, would exclude the members of the first legislature under the Constitution, as most of the offices would then be created.

Mr. Williamson seconded the motion. He did not see why members of the legislature should be ineligible to vacancies happening during the term of their election.

Mr. Sherman was for entirely incapacitating members of the legislature. He thought their eligibility to offices would give too much influence to the executive. He said the incapacity ought at least to be extended to cases where salaries should be increased, as well as created, during the term of the member. He mentioned, also, the expedient by which the restriction could be evaded; to wit, an existing officer might be translated to an office created, and a member of the legislature, be then put into the office vacated.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris contended that the eligibility of members to office would lessen the influence of the executive. If they can not be appointed themselves, the executive will appoint their relations and friends, retaining the service and votes of the members for his purpose, in the legislature; whereas the appointment of the members deprives him of such an advantage.

Mr. Gerry thought the eligibility of members would have the effect of opening batteries against good officers, in order to drive them out and make way for members of the legislature.

Mr. Gorham was in favor of the amendment. Without it, we go farther than has been done in any of the States, or, indeed, any other country. The experience of the State governments, where there was no such ineligibility, proved that it was not necessary; on the contrary, that the eligibility was among the inducements for fit men to enter into the legislative service.

Mr. Randolph was inflexibly fixed against inviting men into the legislature by the prospect of being appointed to offices.

Mr. Baldwin remarked, that the example of the States was not applicable. The legislatures there are so numerous that an exclusion of their members would not leave proper men for offices. The case would be otherwise in the General Government.

Colonel MASON. Instead of excluding merit, the ineligibility will keep out corruption, by excluding office-hunters.

Mr. Wilson considered the exclusion of members of the legislature as increasing the influence of the executive, as observed by Mr. Gouverneur Morris; at the same time that it would diminish the general energy of the Government. He said that the legal disqualification for office would be odious to those who did not wish for office, but did not wish either to be marked by so degrading a distinction.

Mr. PINCKNEY. The first legislature will be composed of the ablest men to be found. The States will select such to put the Government into operation. Should the report of the committee, or even the amendment, be agreed to, the great offices, even those of the judiciary department, which are to continue for life, must be filled, while those most capable of filling them will be under a disqualification.

On the question on Mr. King's motion—

New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, ay, 5; Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland, South Carolina, Georgia, no, 5.

The amendment being thus lost, by the equal division of the States, Mr. Williamson moved to insert the words "created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased," before the word "during," in the report of the committee.

Mr. King seconded the motion, and on the question—

New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, ay, 5; Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland, South Carolina, no, 4; Georgia, divided.

The last clause, rendering a seat in the legislature and an office incompatible, was agreed to nem. con.

The report, as amended and agreed to, is as follows:

"The members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States, created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during the time for which they shall respectively be elected. And no person, holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office. (251)

Adjourned.

[September 12, 1787, the Committee to Revise the Style, &c., reported the Constitution, in which the following changes were made in regard to the election and qualifications of Senators.]

FRIDAY, September 14, 1787.

Article I, section 3, the words "by lot"* were struck out nem. con., on motion of Mr. Madison, that some rule might prevail in the rotation that would prevent both the members from the same State from going out at the same time.

"Ex officio" struck out of the same section, as superfluous, nem. con.; and "or affirmation," after "oath," inserted also unanimously.

Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved—"That persons impeached be suspended from their offices until they be tried and acquitted."

* "By lot" had been reinstated from the report of the committee of five, made on the 6th of August, as a correction of the printed report by the committee of style, &c.

Mr. MADISON. The President is made too dependent already on the Legislature by the power of one branch to try him in consequence of an impeachment by the other. This intermediate suspension will put him in the power of one branch only. They can at any moment, in order to make way for the functions of another who will be more favorable to their views, vote a temporary removal of the existing magistrate.

Mr. King concurred in the opposition to the amendment.

On the question to agree to it—

Connecticut, South Carolina, Georgia, ay, 3; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, no, 8.

Article I, section 4, "except as to the places of choosing Senators," was added, nem. con., to the end of the first clause, in order to exempt the seats of government in the States from the power of Congress.

Article I, section 5—

"Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy."

Colonel Mason and Mr. Gerry moved to insert, after the word "parts," the words "of the proceedings of the Senate," so as to require publication of all the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

It was intimated, on the other side, that cases might arise where secrecy might be necessary in both Houses. Measures preparatory to a declaration of war, in which the House of Representatives was to concur, were instanced.

On the question, it passed in the negative.

Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, ay, 3; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, Georgia, no, 7; South Carolina, divided.

Mr. Baldwin observed that the clause, Article I, section 6, declaring that no member of Congress, "during the time for which he was elected, shall be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time," would not extend to offices created by the Constitution, and the salaries of which would be created, not increased, by Congress at their first session. The members of the first Congress, consequently, might evade the disqualification in this instance. He was neither seconded nor opposed, nor did anything further pass on the subject.

EXTRACTS FROM THE CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE. I.

SECTION. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of Honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

SECTION. 4. The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

SECTION. 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

SECTION. 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

ARTICLE XIV, OF THE AMENDMENTS.

SECTION 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President or Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

ACT OF JULY 25, 1866.

REVISED STATUTES, TITLE II, CHAPTER 1.

SEC. 14. The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

SEC. 15. Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for, who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At twelve o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house, he shall be declared duly elected Senator. But if the same person has not received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to take proceedings as required by this section, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for Senator, and the person who receives a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. If no person receives such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at twelve o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and shall take at least one vote, until a Senator is elected.

SEC. 16. Whenever on the meeting of the legislature of any State a vacancy exists in the representation of such State in the Senate, the legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to elect a person to fill such vacancy, in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term.

SEC. 17. Whenever during the session of the legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized and has notice of such vacancy.

SEC. 18. It shall be the duty of the executive of the State from which any Senator has been chosen, to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States.

SEC. 19. The certificate mentioned in the preceding section shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

EXTRACTS FROM REVISED LAW RELATING TO PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES BY CANDIDATES FOR SENATOR OF THE UNITED STATES, LIMITATION OF AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURES BY, ETC.

SEC. 8. The word "candidate" as used in this section shall include all persons whose names are presented for nomination for Representative or Senator in the Congress of the United States at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement or election at any general or special election held in connection with the nomination or election of a person to fill such office, whether or not such persons are actually nominated, indorsed, or elected.

* * * * * * *

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement at any general or special election, or election by the legislature of any State, as Senator in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than ten nor more than fifteen days before the day for holding such primary election or nominating convention, and not less than ten nor more than fifteen days before the day of the general or special election at which he is seeking indorsement, and not less than five nor more than ten days before the day upon which the first vote is to be taken in the two houses of the legislature before which he is a candidate for election as Senator, file with the Secretary of the Senate at Washington, District of Columbia, a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement or election at any general or special election, or for election by the legislature of any State, shall, within fifteen days after such primary election or nominating convention, and within thirty days after any such general or special election, and within thirty days after the day upon which the legislature shall have elected a Senator, file with the Clerk of the House of Repre entatives or with the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, up to, on, and after the day of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the legislature, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination, indorsement, or election.

Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge, before the completion of any such primary election or nominating convention or general or special election or election by the legislature, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in his candidacy, and if any such promise or pledge shall have been made the name or names, the address or addresses, and the occupation or occupations, of the person or persons to whom such promise or pledge shall have been made, shall be stated, together with a description of the position relating to which such promise or pledge has been made. In the event that no such promise or pledge has been made by such candidate, that fact shall be distinctly stated.

No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall promise any office or position to any person, or to use his influence or to give his support to any person for any office or position for the purpose of procuring the support of such person, or of any person, in his candidacy; nor shall any candidate for Senator of the United States give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any particular candidate for the legislature of the State in which he resides, but such candidate may, within the limititions and restrictions and subject to the requirements of this act, contribute to political committees having charge of the disbursement of campaign funds.

No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election, any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That no candidate for Representative in Congress shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding five thousand dollars in any campaign for his nomination and election; and no candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding ten thousand dollars in any campaign for his nomination and election: Provided further, That money expended by any such candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which he resides, or for his necessary personal expenses, incurred for himself alone, for travel and subsistence, stationery and postage, writing or printing (other than in newspapers), and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service, shall not be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this section, and shall not be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense and need not be shown in the statements herein required to be filed.

The statements herein required to be made and filed before the general election, or the election by the legislature at which such candidate seeks election, need not contain items of which publicity is given in a previous statement, but the statement required to be made and filed after said general election or election by the legislature, shall, in addition to an itemized statement of all expenses not theretofore given publicity, contain a summary of all preceding statements.

Any person, not then a candidate for Senator of the United States, who shall have given, contributed, expended, used, or promised any money or thing of value to aid or assist in the nomination or election of any particular member of the legislature of the State in which he resides, shall, if he thereafter becomes a candidate for such office, or if he shall thereafter be elected to such office without becoming a candidate therefor, comply with all of the provisions of this section relating to candidates for such office, so far as the same may be applicable; and the statement herein required to be made, verified, and filed after such election shall contain a full, true, and itemized account of each and every gift, contribution, expenditure, and promise whenever made, in any wise relating to the nomination or election of members of the legislature of said State, or in any wise connected with or pertaining to his nomination and election of which publicity is not given in a previous statement.

Every statement herein required shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths; and the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or to the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, duly stamped and registered, within the time required herein, shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act.

This act shall not be construed to annul or vitiate the laws of any State, not directly in conflict herewith, relating to the nomination or election of candidates for the offices herein named, or to exempt any such candidate from complying with such State laws.

SEC. 10. That nothing contained in this act shall limit or affect the right of any person to spend money for proper legal expenses in maintaining or contesting the results of any election.

SEC. 11. That every person willfully violating any of the foregoing provisions of this act, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than one thousand dollars or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

CONTRIBUTIONS BY CORPORATIONS.

An Act To prohibit corporations from making money contributions in connection with political elections.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any laws of Congress, to make a money contribution in connection with any election to any political office. It shall also be unlawful for any corporation whatever to make a money contribution in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice-Presidential electors or a Representative in Congress is to be voted for or any election by any State legislature of a United States Senator. Every corporation which shall make any contribution in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be subject to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and every officer or director of any corporation who shall consent to any contribution by the corporation in violation of the foregoing provisions shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not exceeding one thousand and not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, or by imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

Approved, January 26, 1907.

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

I.

CASES CONCERNING THE POWER OF EXECUTIVES OF STATES TO FILL VACANCIES.

[Third Congress—First session.]

of Delaware.

George Read, a Senator from Delaware, resigned his seat in December, 1793, during the recess of the legislature of said State. The legislature met in January and adjourned in February, 1794. On the 19th of March, Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy. It was determined that Mr. Johns was not entitled to his seat, a session of the legislature having intervened between the resignation of Mr. Read and the appointment of Mr. Johns.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 3d Cong., 1793-'95, within pages 73-78.

MONDAY, March 24, 1794.

Kensey Johns appeared and produced his credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States; which were read.

Whereupon it was moved that they be referred to the consideration of the Committee of Elections before the said Kensey Johns should be permitted to qualify, who are directed to report thereon; and it passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Edwards, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Izard, Mitchell, Morris, Potts, Rutherfurd, Strong, and Vining.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1794.

Mr. Bradley reported from the Committee on Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware a Senator of the United States in the place of George Read, resigned.

Ordered, That the report lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, March 27, 1794.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States.

On motion that the report be recommitted, it passed in the negative; and,

After progress, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of this report be postponed until to-morrow

FRIDAY, March 28, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Bradley, Ellsworth, Mitchell, Rutherford, Brown, Livermore, and Taylor.]

The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware of Kensey Johns as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report—

That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of December, 1793, and during the recess of the legislature of said State.

That the legislature of the said State met in January and adjourned in February, 1794.

That upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid.

Whereupon the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

On the question to agree to this report, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradford, Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Cabot, Edwards, Ellsworth, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, King, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Mitchell, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

NAYS—Messrs. Foster, Izard, Morris, Potts, Rutherfurd, Strong, and Vining.

Resolved, That an attested copy of the resolution of the Senate on the appointment of Kensey Johns to be a Senator of the United States be transmitted by the President of the Senate to the executive of the State of Delaware.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1801.]

URIAH TRACY,

Senator from Connecticut from December 6, 1796, till his death, July 19, 1807.

Mr. Tracy's first term expired March 3, 1801. On March 4, at a special session of the Senate, he produced credentials of appointment by the governor of Connecticut to fill the vacancy. It appears from the credentials, which are dated February 20, 1801, that the legislature of the State was not then in session, and that he was appointed "from the 3d of March next until the next meeting of the legislature of said State." Exception being taken to his credentials he was admitted by a vote of 13 yeas to 10 nays. Under these credentials he occupied his seat during the special session of the Senate, March 4 and 5. In May following he was elected by the legislature, and on December 6, the second day of the next session of Congress, he produced his credentials of election and the oath was administered.

The brief history of the case here given, taken from the Annals of Congress, 6th Cong., 1799–1801, page 763, contains all that there is relating to it, neither the debate referred to nor the grounds of the decision being given.

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1801.

Exception being taken to the credentials of the Hon. Mr. Tracy, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, a debate ensued; and,

On motion that he be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chipman, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, Livermore, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Ross, Sheafe, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Baldwin, Brown, Cocke, S. T. Mason, Muhlenberg, Nicholas, Pinckney, and Stone.

[Eleventh Congress—First session.]

SAMUEL SMITH,

Senator from Maryland from March 4, 1803, to March 3, 1815, and from December 17, 1822, to March 3, 1833.

On the expiration of Mr. Smith's first term, viz, March 3, 1809, the legislature of Maryland not having elected his successor, and not then being in session, he was appointed by the governor on March 4 to fill the vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature, which would take place on the 5th of June next. Thereupon Mr. Smith addressed a letter to the Senate, setting forth these facts, and submitting to its determination the question whether the appointment would or would not cease on the first day of the meeting of the legislature. It was determined that he was entitled to hold his seat in the Senate during the session of the legislature, unless the legislature should fill such vacancy by the appointment of a Senator, and the Senate be officially informed thereof. Under these credentials Mr. Smith held his seat during the special session of the Senate March 4–7, 1809, and during the first session of the Eleventh Congress (May 22 to June 28, 1809). On the 16th of November following he was elected by the legislature, and on December 4, in the next session of Congress, he produced his credentials of election and the oath was administered.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 11th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, 1809–'10, within pages 15–25.

MONDAY, May 29, 1809.

The President laid before the Senate a letter from Mr. Smith, of Maryland, stating that being appointed by the executive of that State a Senator, in conformity with the Constitution, until the next meeting of the legislature, which will take place on the 5th day of June next, he submits to the determination of the Senate the question whether an appointment under the executive of Maryland to represent that State in the Senate of the United States will or will not cease on the first day of the meeting of the legislature thereof? And the letter was read; and,

After debate, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, May 30, 1809.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the letter from Mr. Smith, of Maryland, communicated yesterday; and,

On motion of Mr. Giles, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the 5th of June next.

TUESDAY, June 6, 1809.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the letter of Mr. Smith, a Senator from the State of Maryland; and

Mr. Giles submitted a resolution, which was amended, and is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel Smith, a Senator appointed by the executive of the State of Maryland to fill the vacancy which happened in the office of Senator for that State, is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States during the session of the Legislature of Maryland, which, by the proclamation of the governor of said State, was to commence on the 5th day of the present month of June; unless said legislature shall fill such vacancy by the appointment of a Senator, and this Senate be officially informed thereof."

On motion by Mr. Anderson to amend the motion by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting:

"That any Senator of this body who holds a seat under an executive appointment cannot, according to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, be entitled to continue to hold his seat as a member of this body after the meeting of the legislature of the State from which such Senator may be a member,"

And a division of the motion for amendment was called for, and the question having been taken on striking out, it passed in the negative; and,

The motion for amendment having been lost, the original motion was agreed to—yeas 19, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Griswold, Hillhouse, Lambert, Mathewson, Meigs, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Thruston, White, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Leib, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, and Turner.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1825.]

JAMES LANMAN,

Senator from Connecticut from March 4, 1819, to March 3, 1825.

Mr. Lanman's term expired March 3, 1825. March 4, 1825, he produced credentials of appointment by the governor to fill the vacancy. The credentials of appointment were dated February 8, 1825, and set forth that the President of the United States had desired the Senate to convene on the 4th day of March, and had caused official notice of that fact to be communicated to the governor. They were "to take effect immediately after the 3d day of March, 1825, and to continue until the next meeting of the legislature." Exception being taken to the credentials, they were referred to a committee, who reported the facts as above. On motion that he be admitted, it was determined in the negative, the grounds on which the Senate proceeded not being given.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1825.

The President laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. James Lanman, inclosing the credentials of his appointment by the governor of Connecticut as a Senator of the United States, "to take effect immediately after the 3d day of March, 1825, and to continue until the next meeting of the legislature," and expressing his readiness to receive the usual qualifications.

The letter and credentials were read.

On motion by Mr. Holmes, of Maine, that Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution, a debate ensued, and,

On motion,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

SATURDAY, March 5, 1825.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of yesterday, "that Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution," and,

On motion by Mr. Eaton,

Ordered, That said motion, together with the credentials of Mr. Lanman, be referred to a select committee, to consist of three members, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. Eaton, Mr. Edwards, and Mr. Tazewell were appointed the committee.

Mr. Van Buren submitted the following motion for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Hon. James Lanman have leave to be heard at the bar of the Senate on the question as to his right to a seat therein under an appointment by the executive of Connecticut."

MONDAY, March 7, 1825.

Mr. Eaton, from the select committee to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the motion "that Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution," together with the credentials of Mr. Lanman, submitted the following report, which was read:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Eaton, Edwards, and Tazewell.]

That Mr. Lanman's term of service in the Senate expired on the 3d March. On the 4th, he presented to the Senate a certificate, regularly and properly authenticated, from Oliver Wolcott, governor of the State of Connecticut, setting forth that the President of the United States had desired the Senate to convene on the 4th day of March, and had caused official notice of that fact to be communicated to him.

The certificate of appointment is dated the 8th of February, 1825, subsequent to the time of notification to him by the President. The certificate further recites that, at the time of its execution, the legislature of the State was not in session, and would not be until the month of May.

The committee have looked into the Journals of the Senate to discover if they could find any authority or decision by them on this question; and the following have been found recorded:

"On the 27th of April, 1797, William Cocke was appointed a Senator from that State by the governor of Tennessee; his term of service having expired on the 3d of the preceding March, and on the 15th of May took his seat, and was qualified.

"On the 3d of March, 1801, the seat of Uriah Tracy became vacant, the time for which he had been elected having expired. On the 20th of February preceding the governor of Connecticut reappointed him a Senator, and, in pursuance thereof, he was qualified and took his seat.

"Joseph Anderson, a Senator from Tennessee, was appointed by the governor a member of the Senate on the 6th of February, 1809, and on the 4th of March after took his seat; the period for which he had been elected having on the preceding day expired.

"John Williams, of Tennessee, on the 20th of January, 1817, was appointed a Senator in Congress, to take his seat on the 4th of March, when the term for which he had been elected would expire. Mr. Williams appeared, was qualified, and took his seat."

In none of these cases does it appear that there was any objection made, or question raised, except in 1801, in the case of Mr Tracy, when the vote was 13 for and 10 against the right of the member to take his seat. Those are the only analogous cases the committee have been able to find.

By reference to the statute laws of Connecticut the committee find that in that State there is a law upon this subject which is in the following words: "Whenever any vacancy shall happen in the representation of this State in the Senate of the United States, by the expiration of the term of service of a Senator, or by resignation or otherwise, the general assembly, if then in session, shall, by a concurrent vote of the senate and house of representatives, proceed to fill said vacancy by a new election; and in case such vacancy shall happen in the recess of the general assembly, the governor shall appoint some person to fill the same until the next meeting of the general assembly."

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 5th instant, that the Hon. James Lanman have leave to be heard at the bar of the Senate on the question as to his right to a seat therein; and agreed thereto.

Mr. Edwards submitted the following motion; which was read:

"Resolved, That the Hon. James Lanman, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Connecticut, be now admitted to the oath required by the Constitution."

And on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 23.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bell, Bouligny, Chase, Clayton, D'Wolf, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd of Massachusetts, M'Ilvaine, Mills, Noble, Rowan, Seymour, and Thomas.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, King of Alabama, Lloyd of Maryland, Macon, Marks, Ruggles, Smith, Tazewell, Van Buren, Van Dyke, and Williams.

AMBROSE H. SEVIER,

Senator from Arkansas from December 5, 1836, to March 4, 1837, and from March 8, 1837, till he resigned, March 15, 1848.

The State of Arkansas was admitted into the Union in June, 1836. In October, 1836, the legislature of that State elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators. On the allotment of the Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, Mr. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1837. The legislature of Arkansas had no opportunity to fill the vacancy, not having been in session after the result of the allotment was known in that State. January 17, 1837, the governor of Arkansas appointed Mr. Sevier to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. At the special session of the Senate in March the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee reported that as the time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot, and as the legislature, not being in session after this decision, could not supply the vacancy, it came "fairly within the provision of the Constitution contained in the third section of the first article, which declares, 'and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise,' &c."; and reported a resolution that the oath required by the Constitution be administered to him. March 8 this resolution passed and Mr. Sevier took his seat. No debates on the adoption of the resolution are found. Under these credentials Mr. Sevier held the seat during the remainder of the special session March 8–10, during the first session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, September 4 to October 16, and from December 4–13 of the second session, when he presented credentials of election (which had taken place November 7) for term ending March 3, 1843, and the oath was administered.

MONDAY, December 5, 1836.

Mr. Benton presented the credentials of the Hon. A. H. Sevier and W. S. Fulton, Senators-elect from the State of Arkansas. The Vice-President administered the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and they took their seats.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

Resolved, That the Secretary put into the ballot-box three papers of equal size, numbered 1, 2, 3. Each of the Senators from the State of Arkansas draw out one paper. No. 1, if drawn, shall entitle the member to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1837; No. 2 in the class whose terms will expire the 3d day of March, 1839; and No. 3 in the class whose terms will expire on the 3d day of March, 1841.

In pursuance of the above order, Mr. Sevier drew from the ballot-box No. 1, and Mr. Fulton No. 3. Therefore Mr. Sevier's term expires on the 3d of March, 1837, and Mr. Fulton's on the 3d of March, 1841.

MONDAY, February 27, 1837.

Mr. Fulton presented the credentials of the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, appointed a Senator by the governor of Arkansas to fill the vacancy that will occur on the 4th of March next, for the term of six years.

Mr. Webster expressed his doubts as to the constitutionality of making an appointment, no vacancy having occurred.

Mr. Fulton remarked that he and his colleague were aware of this difficulty; but he (Mr. F.), supposing that it would be a matter for the next Senate to act upon, presented the credentials under that impression.

The Chair said that it was not for the Senate to consider the qualifications of Senators elected to the next Congress. That Congress must act on this subject.

Mr. Sevier said that he had very great doubt of the legality of the appointment, and did not at all doubt the patriotic motives which influenced the Senator from Massachusetts in expressing himself as he had done. Mr. S. cared not how the matter should be decided, one way or the other.

Mr. Webster was sure that the honorable Senator was very indifferent as to how the question might be decided, and would give him credit as to his motives in intimating that there might be some irregularity in the proceeding.

Mr. Sevier expressed himself quite satisfied with the course pursued by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

SATURDAY, March 4, 1837.

The Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, whose credentials were read the 27th February, 1837, appearing for the purpose of being qualified,

On motion by Mr. King, of Alabama,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the same be postponed to Monday next.

MONDAY, March 6, 1837.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials of the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, and,

On motion by Mr. Fulton,

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1837.

Mr. Grundy, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, submitted the following report:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Grundy (chairman), Crittenden, Morris, King of Georgia, and Wall.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the credentials of the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

At the last session of Congress the State of Arkansas was admitted into the Union, and the legislature of that State, in the month of October, 1836, elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators to represent the State in the Senate of the United States. It also appears that upon the allotment of the said Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, the said Ambrose H. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d day of March, 1837, and that the legislature of Arkansas have had no opportunity of filling the vacancy, not having been in session since the fact that the vacancy would occur could have been known in that State. The governor of the State of Arkansas on the 17th day of January last commissioned the said Sevier as Senator to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. Upon this state of the case the question is presented whether the said Ambrose H. Sevier is entitled to his seat under the appointment made by the executive of the State of Arkansas? In looking into the practice of the Senate upon the subject of executive appointments, no case like the present has been found. Several cases have occurred in which the executives of different States in anticipation of the expiration of the regular term of service have appointed Senators (the legislatures not being in session), and in all of these cases the Senators thus appointed were admitted to their seats, until the called session of the Senate in March, 1825, when Mr. Lanman, of Connecticut, whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1825, produced his credentials from the governor of Connecticut and the Senate decided he was not entitled to his seat by a vote of 23 to 18.

This decision seems to have been generally acquiesced in since that time; nor is it intended by the committee to call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is that the legislature of a State by making elections themselves shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods; and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution.

The case now under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office under his election made by the legislature of Arkansas was decided by lot, agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution on that subject. After the decision thus made, the legislature of Arkansas, not being in session, could not supply the vacancy; and the case, in the opinion of the committee, comes fairly within the provision of the Constitution contained in the third section of the first article, which declares, "and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The committee are of opinion that Mr. Sevier is entitled to his seat under the executive appointment of the 17th of January, 1837, and therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Arkansas, have the oath required by the Constitution administered to him.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and,

On motion by Mr. King, of Georgia,

Ordered, That it lie on the table, and that the report be printed.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1837.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the appointment of the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier; and,

On the question, "Will the Senate agree to the resolution?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 19.

On motion by Mr. Grundy, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright, and Young.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Webster, and Williams.

Whereupon the oath prescribed by law was administered to the Hon. Mr. Sevier, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[Thirty-second Congress—Second session.]

ROBERT C. WINTHROP,

Senator from Massachusetts from July 30, 1850, to February 7, 1851.

Mr. Winthrop was appointed July 27, 1850, to fill a vacancy happening in the Senate by the resignation of Daniel Webster. February 1, 1851, Robert Rantoul was elected by the legislature to fill the unexpired term. February 4, Mr. Rantoul not having appeared to take the seat, Mr. Winthrop offered a resolution, which was agreed to, "that the Committee on the Judiciary inquire and report to the Senate, as early as practicable, at what period the term of service of a Senator appointed by the executive of a State during the recess of the legislature thereof rightfully expires." The committee reported that a person so appointed had a right to the seat until the legislature, at its next meeting, should elect a person to fill the unexpired term, and the person elected should accept, and his acceptance appear to the Senate; that presentation of credentials implied acceptance; that these views were sustained by precedents. The report was debated, but no action taken, the whole subject being laid on the table. Mr. Winthrop vacated the seat February 7, 1851, when Mr. Rantoul's credentials were presented.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 2d sess. 31st Cong., 1850–'51, with the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 31st Cong., 1850–'51, No. 269.

The debates on the case are found in the Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 31st Cong., vol. 23, within pages 425–478, special references to which are inserted below.

TUESDAY, February 4, 1851.

Mr. Winthrop submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire and report to the Senate, as early as practicable, at what period the term of service of a Senator appointed by the executive of a State during the recess of the legislature thereof rightfully expires."

[Mr. Winthrop accompanied the introduction of the resolution by some remarks on the practice of the Senate in regard to the subject, expressing a desire in his own case to hold his seat just so long as he was constitutionally entitled thereto and no longer. These remarks are found on pages 425, 426 of the Congressional Globe referred to.]

WEDNESDAY, February 5, 1851.

Mr. Butler, from the Committee on the Judiciary, consisting of Messrs, Butler (chairman), Berrien, Bradbury, Dayton, and Downs, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire and report at what period the term of service of a Senator appointed by the executive of a State during the recess of the legislature thereof rightfully expires, submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 5, 1851.—Submitted, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Butler made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution directing said committee to inquire and report at what period the term of service of a Senator appointed by the executive of a State during the recess of the legislature thereof rightfully expires, have had the same under consideration, and report:

The question presented by the resolution turns mainly upon the construction of the clause of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall fill such vacancies."

Your committee are of the opinion that the sitting member under executive appointment has a right to occupy his seat until the vacancy shall be filled by the legislature of the State of which he is a Senator during the next meeting thereof. To fill such vacancy it is not only necessary to make an election, but that the person elected shall accept the appointment. And your committee are further of the opinion that such acceptance should appear by the presentation to the Senate of the credentials of the member-elect, or other official information of the fact—at which time the office of the sitting member terminates. When the member-elect is present and ready to qualify his express acceptance is at once made known; and when his credentials are presented in his absence his acceptance may be fairly implied.

These general views are sustained by precedents. An early one may be found in the Senate Journal of 1809, page 381, where the question was settled, after debate, by the adoption on the 6th of June of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel Smith, a Senator appointed by the executive of Maryland to fill the vacancy which happened in the office of Senator for that State, is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States during the session of the legislature of Maryland, which, by the proclamation of the governor of said State, was to commence on the 5th day of the present month of June, unless said legislature shall fill such vacancy by the appointment of a Senator, and this Senate be officially informed thereof."

The precedent in this case has been uniformly followed from that time to the present in the many cases that have arisen involving the same question.

[A list of precedents accompanying the report is found annexed to the report in the volume of Senate Reports referred to in the head-note. It is not printed here, as all the cases are included in the list of appointments on page 146 of this book.]

FRIDAY, February 7, 1851.

Mr. Winthrop presented the credentials of the Hon. Robert Rantoul, jr., elected a Senator by the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Daniel Webster; which were read.

[Mr. Winthrop stated that he presented the credentials "with the understanding that, agreeably to the recent report of the Judiciary Committee, the presentation of the credentials would imply an acceptance on the part of the Senator-elect, so far forth at least as to terminate the office of the sitting member." These remarks are found on pages 459, 460 of the Congressional Globe referred to.]

Mr. Clay moved to take up the report of the committee with the view of deciding whether the retiring member is entitled to his seat.*

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

"Resolved, That a Senator appointed by the executive of a State to fill a vacancy is entitled to hold his seat until the Senate is satisfied that a successor is elected and has accepted the office: Provided, Such election and acceptance take place during the session of the legislature held next after the vacancy occurs, and that such acceptance ought not to be inferred from the mere presentation to the Senate of the credentials of the newly-elected Senator."

[A debate on the question whether the right to a seat under executive appointment expires on the day of the meeting of the legislature or not until an election has taken place is found on pages 460–463.]

Mr. Rhett moved to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting the following:

"That a Senator holding a seat by appointment of the executive of a State can only fill the same 'until the next meeting of the legislature' thereof, at which time it devolves upon the legislature of the State to fill the vacancy then existing."†

An amendment having been proposed by Mr. Rhett, on motion by Mr. Hale that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 22, nays 25.

On motion by Mr. Rhett, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Benton, Bradbury, Butler, Chase, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, Jones, King, Miller, Pearce, Phelps, Pratt, Sturgeon, Upham, and Wales.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Clarke, Davis of Massachusetts, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Foote, Greene, Mangum, Mason, Morton, Norris, Rhett, Rusk, Smith, Soulé, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Walker, Whitcomb, and Yulee.

SATURDAY, February 8, 1851.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, in relation to the duration of an appointment made by the executive of a State to fill vacancies in the Senate, and after debate (which is found on pages 477, 478 of the Congressional Globe referred to),

Mr. Baldwin proposed the following resolution as an amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts:

"Resolved, That a Senator appointed by the executive of a State in consequence of the happening of a vacancy during the recess of the legislature is entitled to hold his seat under the temporary appointment of the executive until such vacancy is filled by the legislature at the next session thereof, and the person appointed to fill the same shall appear and be qualified therefor, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution."*

On motion by Mr. Hale,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

*This resolution is taken from the Congressional Globe. It does not appear in the Senate Journal.

ARCHIBALD DIXON,

Senator from Kentucky from December 20, 1852, till March 3, 1855.

December 15, 1851, Henry Clay addressed a letter to the general assembly of Kentucky resigning his seat in the Senate, "to take effect on the first Monday of September, 1852." December 30, 1851, Archibald Dixon was elected by the legislature to fill that unexpired term. June 29, 1852, during the recess of the legislature, Henry Clay died. July 6, the governor appointed David Meriwether Senator "until the time the resignation of Henry Clay takes effect." Mr. Meriwether's credentials were presented and he took his seat July 15, and held it until Congress adjourned August 31. December 6, the Senate reassembled, Mr. Meriwether did not appear, and Mr. Dixon appeared and presented his credentials. Objection was made to his taking the oath of office, on the ground that the seat belonged to Mr. Meriwether; that Mr. Meriwether had been appointed to fill a vacancy happening by the death of a Senator, and that he had a right to the seat until the next meeting of the legislature, and that it was not in the power of the governor to limit his term of office to the first Monday in September, 1852. The seat was vacant until December 20, when the Senate by a vote of 27 yeas to 16 nays resolved that Mr. Dixon had been duly elected "to fill the vacancy in the Senate occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Henry Clay, and was entitled to a seat therein."

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journals, 1st and 2d sess. 32d Cong., 1851–'52 and 1852–'53. There being no report of a committee in the case, an extract from the remarks of Mr. Rusk (page 93 of the Congressional Globe, vol. 26, 2d sess. 32d Cong., December 20, 1852) is given, which states briefly the main points under discussion by the Senate.

Special references to each day's debates on the subject, most of which are found within pages 1-96 of the Congressional Globe above referred to, are inserted below.

"The following facts make up the case: On the 17th of December, 1851, Henry Clay was a Senator from Kentucky, chosen by the legislature for six years, which would have expired on the 3d of March, 1855. Being so a Senator, he resigned by a communication to the legislature of Kentucky, declaring that it was to take effect on the first Monday in September, 1852. The legislature, then in session, received the resignation, and chose Mr. Dixon to fill the vacancy thus to occur from the first Monday in September, 1852, to the 3d day of March, 1855. The legislature then adjourned. On the 29th day of June, 1852, during the recess of the legislature of Kentucky, Mr. Clay died, and the governor of that State made a 'temporary appointment' of Mr. Meriwether as a Senator from Kentucky, to hold the seat until the first Monday of September, 1852. Mr. Meriwether immediately took the vacant seat, and held it until Congress adjourned on the last day of August, 1852. On the 6th of December, 1852, the Senate reassembles, Mr Meriwether does not appear, and Mr. Dixon appears and presents his credentials, and claims the vacant seat.

"Manifestly, Mr. Dixon is one of two Senators 'chosen by the legislature' of Kentucky 'for six years,' and he was chosen to fill a vacancy which has happened in the term of Mr. Clay.

"The whole question turns on the point, how did this vacancy happen? Mr. Clay resigned, fixing the first Monday of September as the day when he should vacate his seat, and died, nevertheless, a Senator before that day arrived. Mr. Dixon was appointed by the legislature when in session, before not only the day which Mr. Clay's resignation fixed for his retirement, but also before Mr. Clay's death.

"We who maintain Mr. Dixon's title insist that the vancancy happened by Mr. Clay's resignation. On the contrary, those who deny Mr. Dixon's title insist that the vacancy happened by Mr. Clay's death.

"Four questions arise:

"First. Can a Senator resign?

"Second. Can a Senator resigning appoint a future day for his retirement from the Senate?

"Third. Can the proper appointing power receive such a resignation, and prospectively fill the vacancy?

"Fourth. If the legislature so prospectively fill the vacancy, can the appointment be defeated by the death of the resigning Senator before the arrival of the day fixed for his retirement from the Senate?

"If a Senator can resign, and can so resign prospectively, and if the legislature can so fill the vacancy prospectively, and if their action cannot be defeated by the death of the resigning Senator, then Mr. Dixon's title is good, valid, and complete.

"The first question is expressly decided by the Constitution, which declares that vacancies may 'happen by resignation.'

"The second question is decided by an unbroken succession of precedents from the foundation of the Government. Mr. Bledsoe so resigned, fixing a future day; so did Mr. Clay in 1842; so did Mr. Berrien in 1852; and so did Mr. Foote in 1852.

"The third question is answered with equal distinctness by precedents. The legislature of Kentucky prospectively filled the vacancy made by Mr. Clay's resignation in 1842; the governor of Georgia prospectively filled the vacancy of Mr. Berrien in 1852; and the governor or legislature of Mississippi prospectively filled the vacancy of Mr. Foote in 1852.

"The only question remaining is the fourth: Can the death of the resigning Senator after the legislature has prospectively filled the vacancy, and before the day fixed for his retirement, defeat the appointment of his successor already made?"

THURSDAY, July 15, 1852.

Mr. Bright presented the credentials of the Hon. David Meriwether, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State of Kentucky until the first Monday in September next, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. Henry Clay; which were read, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. Meriwether, he took his seat in the Senate.

[A debate on the question whether Mr. Meriwether's credentials should be referred to a committee on account of the irregularity they contained of limiting the term of service to the first Monday in September is found on pages 1783, 1784 of the Congressional Globe, vol. 24, part 3, 1st sess. 32d Cong., 1851–'52.]

MONDAY, December 6, 1852.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, presented the credentials of the Hon. Archibald Dixon, chosen a Senator by the legislature of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, to serve for the unexpired term rendered vacant by the resignation of the Hon. Henry Clay, to take effect from the first Monday of September, 1852, until the end of the term for which said Henry Clay was elected; which were read.

An objection being made by Mr. Gwin to administering the oath prescribed by law to the Hon. Mr. Dixon, a debate ensued, and the following resolution was submitted by Mr. Gwin:

"Resolved, That the credentials of Archibald Dixon, esq., be referred to a select committee of five, to consider and report thereon."

And Mr. Mangum having proposed the following amendment: Insert at the end of the resolution, "and that the said Archibald Dixon be now qualified and permitted to take his seat in the Senate, and occupy the same pending the action of the said committee,"

By unanimous consent the proceeding thereon was suspended.

* * * * * * *

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials of the Hon. Archibald Dixon, and, after further debate, on motion, and by unanimous consent, the proceeding thereon was suspended for the purpose of receiving a report of a committee.

* * * * * * *

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials of the Hon. Archibald Dixon, with the resolution submitted by Mr. Gwin.

[The debates of this day on the subject are found on pages 1–5 of the volume of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. They include a discussion of the prima facie right of Mr. Dixon to the seat pending the action of the Senate.]

TUESDAY, December 7, 1852.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 12–19 of the Globe.]

WEDNESDAY, December 8, 1852.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials of the Hon. Archibald Dixon, with the resolution submitted by Mr. Gwin, and,

On motion by Mr. Badger,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to Monday next.

MONDAY, December 13, 1852.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials of the Hon. Archibald Dixon, with the resolution submitted by Mr. Gwin.

On motion by Mr. Hunter, and by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That, until the question thereon be decided, the name of Mr. Meriwether be omitted in any call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. Mangum withdrew the amendment which he offered, and Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, offered the following as an amendment to the proposition of Mr. Gwin, to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert: "That the Hon. Archibald Dixon was duly elected by the legislature of the State of Kentucky to fill the vacancy in the Senate occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Henry Clay, and is entitled to a seat therein." *

WEDNESDAY, December 15, 1852.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials, &c.

THURSDAY, December 16, 1852.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials. &c.

MONDAY, December 20, 1852.

The Senate resumed consideration of the credentials of the Hon. Archibald Dixon, with the resolution submitted by Mr. Gwin.

On motion by Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, to amend the resolution by striking out, after the word "resolved," "that the credentials of Archibald Dixon, esq., be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who shall consider and report thereon;" and, in lieu thereof, inserting, "that the Hon. Archibald Dixon was duly elected by the legislature of the State of Kentucky to fill the vacancy in the Senate occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Henry Clay, and is entitled to a seat therein," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 16.

On motion by Mr. Hale, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Brooke, Butler, Chase, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Jones of Tennessee, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, and Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Borland, Bradbury, Bright, Cass, Cathcart, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Gwin, Mason, Norris, Toucey, and Weller.

So the proposed amendment was agreed to.

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it passed in the affirmative; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Dixon, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[The debate is found on pages 90–96 of the Globe.]

COMPENSATION OF MR. MERIWETHER.

TUESDAY, December 21, 1852.

Mr. Rusk submitted the following resolution; which was read:

"Resolved, That the Hon. David Meriwether, late a member of the Senate from the State of Kentucky, be paid his mileage and per diem up to the 20th day of December inclusive."

WEDNESDAY, January 5, 1853.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Rusk the 21st of December last, to pay the Hon. Mr. Meriwether his per diem and mileage, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass.

[Remarks on the adoption of the resolution are found on pages 220–221 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

Thirty-third Congress—First session.

SAMUEL S. PHELPS,

Senator from Vermont from March 4, 1839, to March 3, 1851, and from January 19, 1853, to March 17, 1854.

Mr. Phelps was appointed by the governor of Vermont January 17, 1853, during the recess of the legislature, to fill a vacancy in the Senate happening by the death of William Upham. His credentials were presented and he took his seat January 19. The legislature met in October and adjourned in December without electing a Senator to fill the unexpired term. Mr. Phelps had held the seat during the remainder of the second session of the Thirty-second Congress, ending March 3, and during the special session of the Senate March 4 to April 11. December 20 he again attended. January 4, 1854, the Senate resolved that the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether he was entitled to retain his seat. January 16 the committee reported the resolution, "that the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to his seat in the Senate of the United States." It was accompanied by a minority report adverse to the right of Mr. Phelps to a seat. March 16 the resolution reported by the committee was rejected by a vote of 12 yeas to 26 nays, and it was "Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is not entitled to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States."

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 1st sess. 33d Cong., 1853–'54, together with the report of the committee (majority and minority), from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 33d Cong., vol. 1, 1853–'54, Report No. 34.

The debates in the case, which are extended, are found in the Congressional Globe, vol. 28, part 1 1st sess. 33d Cong., and in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, vol. 29, 1st sess., 32d Cong.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

WEDNESDAY, January 19, 1853.

Mr. Foot presented the credentials of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Vermont to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. William Upham; which were read.

The oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Phelps, and he took his seat in the Senate.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1854.

Mr. Seward submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Whereas the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps was appointed by his excellency the governor of Vermont, in the recess of the legislature of that State, to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States which had happened by the death of the Hon. William Upham, a Senator whose term of six years would have continued until the 4th of March, 1855; and

"Whereas it is understood that since that temporary appointment was made the legislature of Vermont has been convened at their annual session and has adjourned without filling such vacancy: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to retain a seat in the Senate of the United States."

[Mr. Seward accompanied the introduction of the resolution by a statement of the facts in the case, which statement is found on page 103 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1854.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Seward respecting the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate, and the resolution was agreed to.

MONDAY, January 16, 1854.

Mr. Pettit, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate "to inquire whether the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to retain a seat in the Senate of the United States," submitted a report (No. 34), also the views of the minority of the committee, in relation to the subject; which were ordered to be printed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said report, and,

On motion by Mr. Pettit,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday next.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Butler (chairman), Toucey, Bayard, Geyer, Pettit, and Toombs.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 16, 1854.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Pettit made the following report; which was considered, postponed to, and made the special order for the day for, Wednesday next, January 18, 1854:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of the 4th of January, 1854, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to make the following report:

The following is the resolution referred to the committee, to wit:

"Whereas the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps was appointed by his excellency the governor of Vermont, in the recess of the legislature of that State, to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States which had happened by the death of the Hon. William Upham, a Senator, whose term of six years would have continued until the 4th of March, 1855; and

"Whereas it is understood that since that temporary appointment was made the legislature of Vermont has been convened at their regular session, and has adjourned without filling such vacancy: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to retain a seat in the Senate of the United States."

The clauses of the Constitution which bear upon this question may be found in the third section of the first article of that instrument, and read as follows:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall be assembled, in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided, as equally as may be, into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The committee do not think that the last clause of Article V. of the Constitution, which provides "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," has any bearing on this question. If a State refuses to appoint two Senators by some means known to the Constitution, it does consent to be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. And in such case the Senate cannot supply the deficiency by creating a Senator; but it can determine upon the validity of his appointment, whether it comes from the legislature or the executive of the State.

There are two modes by which Senators may be appointed, and whether appointed by the one or the other mode, they possess the same power and exercise the same rights and privileges and receive the same emoluments. These modes may be called primary and contingent. The first rests with the legislature and the second with the executive of the State, when a vacancy happens in the recess of the legislature.

The committee are of opinion that the framers of the Constitution, in providing these two modes by which Senators may be appointed, had in view the obvious propriety, if not necessity, of having two Senators from each State at all times in commission and ready for public service. The committee do not think that the language above quoted, "the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature," is very perspicuous, definite, or concise in its phraseology or meaning, but, on the contrary, it is subject to two constructions. By one of these constructions both the power to appoint and the term of office of the appointee would terminate upon the meeting of the legislature, and thus leave the State for some days, until the legislature could appoint and the new Senator reach the seat of government, without an "equal suffrage in the Senate," a condition which the committee think it was the intention of the constitutional convention to avoid. "The executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature." What may be done until the next meeting of the legislature? May appointments be made until that time? Or may the appointee hold his office until that period and no longer? Or do both determine on the next meeting of the legislature?

The committee think it is a limitation upon the power of the executive to make appointments in the recess of the legislature, and which cannot be exercised after its next meeting; but that the force or effect of such appointment, viz., the commission and office, continue until superseded by the action of the primary appointing power, or the expiration of the Senatorial term. In giving this exposition to this provision of the Constitution, the committee believes it has consulted and gives effect to the spirit of that instrument, and has found the true intention and design of its framers, that the Senate should be composed of two Senators from each State.

On the 6th of June, 1809, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel Smith, a Senator appointed by the executive of Maryland to fill the vacancy which happened in the office of Senator for that State, is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States during the session of the legislature of Maryland, which, by the proclamation of the governor of said State, was to commence on the 5th day of the present month of June, unless said legislature shall fill such vacancy by the appointment of a Senator, and this Senate be officially informed thereof."

The Senate, in this instance, after able and full debate, has solemnly determined that the office of a Senator appointed by the executive does not end on the next meeting of the legislature, but that it may continue during its session.

The construction that the office does not terminate on the meeting of the legislature has received the uniform approval of the Senate from that time till this; for in all instances (and they are numerous) the Senator appointed by the executive has not only held his office until the next meeting of the legislature, but until his successor was appointed and made his appearance here to qualify.

In the late cases of Mr. Winthrop and Mr. Rantoul, of Massachusetts, and of Mr. Meriwether and Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky, many able Senators, to whose opinions great deference is due, expressed their convictions that it was a limitation of time within which the appointment must be made, but that the office continued until superseded by the legislature. If, then, the office does not terminate on the meeting of the legislature, when will it terminate? Can meeting be construed into end, dissolution, or adjournment? Your committee think not.

With these adjudications of the Senate, and the exposition in debate by able Senators, and in view of the propriety if not the necessity of having a full representation from each State in the Senate before us, and believing the language of the Constitution warrants the interpretation we have given it, your committee have come to the conclusion that the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to retain his seat, and offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States.

MINORITY REPORT.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, which reads as follows—

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States"—

Has reported thereon.

As the undersigned dissent from the conclusions of a majority of their colleagues, they ask leave to submit the following report of the minority. The facts upon which the resolution was founded are as follows:

That the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps was appointed by his excellency the governor of the State of Vermont, in the recess of the legislature of that State, to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States which had occurred by the death of the Hon. William Upham, a Senator, whose term of six years would have continued until the 4th March, 1855; and that since the temporary appointment by the governor of said State, the legislature of Vermont has been convened at their annual session, and adjourned without filling the vacancy, as prescribed by the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The question presented to the committee by the foregoing resolution may be thus stated: What shall be the operation of an appointment of a Senator made by the governor of a State in the recess of its legislature where the legislature has met and failed to fill the vacancy by an election?

The decision of this question depends upon the construction of the above words of the Constitution. If the power to fill the vacancy is devolved exclusively upon the legislature at its next meeting, then it would follow that the appointing power of the executive would be exhausted; and the Senator appointed by him could, according to precedent, hold his seat only during the session of the legislature; or, in other words, his commission would expire at the adjournment of the legislature.

The question may be presented in another point of view, which might possibly lead to a different conclusion. If the legislature has merely the potential capacity to fill the vacancy according to its discretion, then a failure to perform this function might leave the executive appointment good to fill a continuing vacancy.

This reduces the question to this proposition, viz: Do the words of the Constitution impose a limitation upon the office or the appointing power?

Before stating the conclusion of the undersigned, it may be proper to cite the precedents which are applicable to the question under consideration.

The first case upon record is as follows: George Read, a Senator from the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of September, 1793, and during the recess of the legislature of said State. The legislature of the said State met in January, and adjourned in February, 1794. Upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid. The Senate decided—

That Kensey Johns was not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, as a session of the legislature of the said State had intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

Mr. Eaton, from the select committee to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the motion "that Mr. Lanman be admitted to take the oath required by the Constitution," together with the credentials of Mr. Lanman, submitted the following report:

"That Mr. Lanman's term of service in the Senate expired on the 3d March. On the 4th he presented to the Senate a certificate, regularly and properly authenticated, from Oliver Wolcott, governor of the State of Connecticut, setting forth that the President of the United States had desired the Senate to convene on the 4th day of March, and had caused official notice of that fact to be communicated to him."

The certificate of appointment is dated the 8th of February, 1825, subsequent to the time of the notification to him by the President. The certificate further recites that at the time of its execution the legislature of the State was not in session, and would not be until the month of May. The Senate decided that Mr. Lanman was not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

In May, 1809, the President of the Senate laid before that body a letter from the Hon. Samuel Smith, of Maryland, stating that, being appointed by the executive of that State a Senator, in conformity with the Constitution, until the next meeting of the legislature, which will take place on the 5th day of June next, he submits to the determination of the Senate the question whether an appointment under the executive of Maryland to represent that State in the Senate of the United States will, or will not, cease on the first day of the meeting of the legislature thereof.

The Senate decided that the Hon. Samuel Smith, a Senator appointed to fill a vacancy, was entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States during the session of the legislature of Maryland, which, by the proclamation of the governor of said State, was to convene on the 5th day of the present month of June, unless said legislature shall fill such vacancy by the appointment of a Senator, and the Senate be officially informed thereof.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, at the second session of the Thirty-first Congress, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate directing said committee to inquire and report at what period the term of service of a Senator appointed by the executive of a State, during the recess of the legislature thereof, rightfully expires, submitted the following report:

"The question presented by the resolution turns mainly upon the construction of the clause of Article XVIII., section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that 'if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall fill such vacancies.'"

Your committee are of the opinion that the sitting member, under executive appointment, has a right to occupy his seat until the vacancy shall be filled by the legislature of the State of which he is a Senator, during the next meeting thereof. To fill such vacancy it is not only necessary to make an election, but that the person elected shall accept the appointment. And your committee are further of the opinion that such acceptance should appear by the presentation to the Senate of the credentials of the member-elect, or other official information of the fact, at which time the office of the sitting member terminates. When the member-elect is present and ready to qualify, his express acceptance is at once made known; and when his credentials are presented in his absence his acceptance may be fairly implied.

Perhaps it would have been as well if the strict and literal meaning of the words, "until the next meeting of the legislature," had been observed on the first occasion in which their construction was brought in question; that would have had the merit of certainty, but a certainty that might have been too severe for the true and liberal intendment of the framers of the Constitution. They certainly did mean to say that an executive appointment should terminate when legislative jurisdiction shall commence or be exercised. To give this severe construction to the words quoted would in all cases leave a State unrepresented for a time, that depending on legislative action; rather than lead to that result the Senate, under the precedents quoted, seem to have regarded the "next meeting of the legislature" as synonymous with the next session of the legislature, during which time the member under executive appointment might hold his seat, unless it should be filled by an election before the termination of a session; and this was probably in analogy to that provision of the Federal Constitution by which power is vested in the President "to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

As there was no reference to a committee, and no reported debate in the case of Mr. Smith, of Maryland, which made the precedent, the essential reasons which governed the judgment of the Senate are not given; the case, however, seems to have been well considered. There are two considerations which seem to have entered into that judgment: First, that the State legislature, after their meeting, should have an opportunity of consultation in making a choice of Senator, and the State, during such term of consultation, should not be deprived of a representative in the Senate. The utmost limit contemplated for the exercise of this legislative jurisdiction was the term of the sitting of the legislature. The second consideration was a confident assumption that the office would be filled during such term. The idea that a session would pass over without an election was not in the mind of the Senate. The Senate went very far when it gave an interpretation to the words referred to beyond their literal meaning, limiting the tenure of office of the sitting member to the day of the meeting of the legislature. This met with a decided opposition from a respectable minority, and in subsequent cases distinguished Senators maintained the same view of the Constitution. By the report of the committee we are required to recognize as authority and to enlarge this liberality of construction—to say that the words "until the next meeting of the legislature" may be construed to mean not only until and during the session of the next legislature, but beyond the next meeting of the legislature; in other terms, that until the next meeting, &c., may operate under the authority of precedent to give the sitting member a right to hold his seat beyond the meeting of the legislature. We cannot agree that by the authority of any precedent these words "until and beyond" shall have such a meaning as will control the import of the Constitution, both in its spirit and letter.

The Senate of the United States is composed of organized constituencies, the State legislatures; to them belong the power primarily of electing their Senators, when they are in session, at the happening of the vacancy, and at their first meeting when it happens in their recess, and on them devolves the exclusive jurisdiction of filling such vacancies. Their right and authority to fill or supply vacancies which have been temporarily filled by executive appointment are as absolute and exclusive as was their power in an original election. When their power is brought into existence it must supersede all others, with this qualification, and that according to precedent, that they have a session to make the choice. In our view it does not depend on the actual exertion of the power to elect, but on its existence. A Senator, under an executive appointment, may or may not represent the political views of his State; he may be the mere personal favorite of the governor. The Senate, as far as practicable, should be made to represent its constitutional constituency, and in this respect should preserve the republican feature of our Union.

In nothing that is said here would we have it inferred that we regard the sitting member whose case is before us as one who may not claim his seat on high grounds and respectable authority. The sanction of a majority of the committee, the opinions of eminent jurists out of this body, go far to sustain his claim. But from the views of the undersigned above presented we do not think the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to hold his seat in this body.

A. P. BUTLER.
J. A. BAYARD.

WEDNESDAY January 18, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. S. S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

On motion of Mr. Pettit,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Wednesday next.

[Some remarks on the postponement of the resolution on account of sickness of Mr Phelps are found on pages 196, 197 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head note.]

THURSDAY, January 26, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary respecting the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Butler,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

[The debate on the subject on this day is found on pages 250–252 of the Globe referred to. It includes remarks by Mr. Pettit, stating the position of the committee.]

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Butler, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 303, 304 of the Globe referred to. Mr. Bayard's speech on this day against the resolution reported by the majority of the committee is reported in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

THURSDAY, February 2, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Pratt,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Thursday next, the 9th instant.

[The debate is found on pages 314–318 of the Congressional Globe referred to. It includes remarks by Mr. Butler, stating the position of the minority of the committee. A speech made by Mr. Phelps on this day in vindication of his title to the seat is found on pages 356–359 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe referred to.]

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Foot,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

[The debate, consisting largely of remarks by Mr. Phelps, is found on pages 359–365 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe referred to.]

MONDAY, March 13, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On motion,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Mason,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

[A speech by Mr. Foot, in vindication of the right of his colleague to the seat, which was the only speech made on the subject this day, is found on pages 630–632 of the Congressional Globe.]

THURSDAY, March 16, 1854.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate, on the question of agreeing thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 26.

On motion by Mr. Foot, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Clayton, Dodge of Iowa, Everett, Fessenden, Foot, Geyer, Morton, Norris, Sebastian, Wade, Walker, and Williams.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Evans, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Hunter, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Sumner, and Toucey.

So the resolution was not agreed to; and it was Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is not entitled to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States.

COMPENSATION OF MR. PHELPS.

Mr. Badger submitted the following resolution; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps, a sum equal to the amount of mileage and per diem compensation of a Senator from the day of his attendance at the present session to this day, inclusive."

And no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

The resolution was read the third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1854.

On motion by Mr. Foot, the vote on passing the resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. Badger, to pay to the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps his mileage and per diem, was reconsidered.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the said resolution; and, having been amended on the motion of Mr. Foot, it was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That there be paid to the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps the amount of mileage and per diem compensation of a Senator from the day of his attendance at the present session to this day, inclusive."

[Thirty-third Congress—First session.]

JARED W. WILLIAMS,

Senator from New Hampshire from December 12, 1853, to August 4, 1854.

Mr. Williams was appointed to fill a vacancy happening by the death of Charles G. Atherton. After his appointment the legislature met and adjourned without electing a Senator to fill the unexpired term. The circumstances of the meeting and adjournment of the legislature were as follows: The constitution of New Hampshire provided that "the senate and house shall assemble every year on the first Wednesday of June, and at such other times as they may judge necessary; and shall dissolve and be dissolved seven days next preceding the said first Wednesday of June." It further provided (article 50, part 2) that "the governor, with advice of council, shall have full power and authority during the sessions of the general court to adjourn or prorogue it to any time the two houses may desire, and to call it together sooner than the time to which it may be adjourned or prorogued, if the welfare of the State should require the same." July 15, 1854, the governor, in a communication to the legislature, said: "Having been informed by a joint committee of both branches of the legislature that you have finished the business before you, and are ready to adjourn, by the authority vested in me, I do hereby adjourn the legislature to the last Wednesday of May next." The Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate reported that this was an adjournment "sine die, in the legal import of the term," and that "the right of representation under appointment" had expired. Mr. Williams claimed that even if this were so, he was entitled to his seat, notwithstanding precedents to the contrary; but claimed further that this was an adjournment to a day certain, and not an adjournment sine die. The Senate concurred in the report of the committee, and "Resolved, That the 'right of representation under appointment' had expired."

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 1st sess. 33d Cong., 1853–'54, together with the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 33d Cong., vol. 2, 1853–'54, No. 385.

The debate in the case, which is brief, is found on pages 2208–2211 of the Congressional Globe, vol. 28, part 3, 1st sess. 33d Cong.

MONDAY, December 12, 1853.

Mr. Weller presented the credentials of the Hon. Jared W. Williams, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State of New Hampshire to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. Charles G. Atherton, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. Williams, he took his seat in the Senate.

TUESDAY, July 25, 1854.

Mr. Mallory submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Whereas the Hon. Jared W. Williams was appointed by his excellency the governor of New Hampshire, in the recess of the legislature of that State, to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States which had happened by the death of the Hon. Charles G. Atherton, a Senator, whose term of service would have continued until the 4th of March, 1859; and

"Whereas it is understood that since that temporary appointment was made the legislature of New Hampshire has been convened at their regular session and has adjourned to the last Wednesday of May next without filling such vacancy, and that said State still claims a right of representation under said appointment, which the appointee is not at liberty to surrender by his act without the action of the Senate: At his request, therefore,

"Resolved, That the subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the facts connected with it and to make such report as they deem proper to enable the Senate to determine whether the right of representation under said appointment has expired."

WEDNESDAY, August 2, 1854.

Mr. Butler, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into and report on the right of the Hon. Jared W. Williams, appointed a Senator by the governor of New Hampshire, to continue to hold his seat under that appointment, submitted a report (No. 385) thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Butler (chairman), Toucey, Bayard, Geyer, Pettit, and Toombs.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

AUGUST 2, 1854.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Butler made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the following preamble and resolution of the Senate, have had the same under consideration, and report:

"Whereas the Hon. Jared W. Williams was appointed by his excellency the governor of New Hampshire, in the recess of the legislature of that State, to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States which had happened by the death of the Hon. Charles G. Atherton, a Senator, whose term of service would have continued till the 4th of March, 1859; and

"Whereas it is understood that since that temporary appointment was made the legislature of New Hampshire has been convened at their regular session, and has adjourned to the last Wednesday of May next, without filling such vacancy, and that said State still claims a right of representation under said appointment, which the appointee is not at liberty to surrender by his act without the action of the Senate: At his request, therefore,

"Resolved, That the subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to inquire into the facts connected with it, and to make such report as they deem proper to enable the Senate to determine whether the right of representation under said appointment has expired."

Under this resolution the committee are required to inquire into the facts connected with the case, and to make such report as they deem proper, to enable the Senate to determine whether the right of representation under said appointment had expired.

As the question to be determined must depend in a great measure on the proceedings of the legislature and constitution of New Hampshire, the committee submit the following as a part of their report, having a bearing on the case:

COMMUNICATION FROM THE GOVERNOR TO THE LEGISLATURE.

To the senate and house of representatives:

I have signed all the bills and resolutions which you have passed the present session and presented for my approval (except the bills and resolutions which I have returned to the house of representatives with my objection thereto), and having been informed by a joint committee of both branches of the legislature that you have finished the business before you and are ready to adjourn, by the authority vested in me I do hereby adjourn the legislature to the last Wednesday of May next.

N. B. BAKER.

"The senate and house shall assemble every year on the first Wednesday of June, and at such other times as they may judge necessary; and shall dissolve and be dissolved seven days next preceding the said first Wednesday of June, and shall be styled the general court of New Hampshire."—Constitution of New Hampshire, page 23.

From the language of the governor's communication to the legislature it seems to have been his judgment that the session had closed; and from the language of the constitution it would appear that it will have terminated on the day mentioned, as by another provision of the constitution the governor on the same day is required to dissolve the legislature. In this view of the subject in proprio vigore, the legislature had no power of assembling from the time of its adjournment, as announced by the governor, until the last Wednesday of May next, when its existence terminated.

There was a power in the governor, should the general welfare require it, to call the legislature together as an existing body. But when so called together what would have been the character of such a meeting? Would it not have been a distinct session, carrying with its acts and doings all the incidents of a separate session? Such would seem to be a fair inference. This being conceded, then it would follow that the late legislature did adjourn sine die in the legal import of the term. If this is a legitimate conclusion this case cannot in any particular be distinguished from that decided by the Senate in the case of the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps, a Senator from Vermont, and the committee refer to that case as the authority for their conclusion in the case under consideration.

In response to the resolution the committee are of opinion that "the right of representation under the appointment" has expired.

THURSDAY, August 3, 1854.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. Jared W. Williams, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of New Hampshire, to continue to hold his seat in the Senate under that appointment; and,

After debate, in concurrence therewith,

Resolved, That "the right of representation under appointment" had expired.

FRIDAY, August 4, 1854.

On motion by Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, to reconsider the vote agreeing to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the right of the Hon. Jared W. Williams to hold his seat in the Senate, under his present appointment, as a Senator from New Hampshire, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 16.

On motion by Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Houston, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Norris, and Weller.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bright, Cooper, Fish, Gillette, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, Pratt, Rockwell, Seward, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, and Wade.

So the Senate proceeded to consider the said report.

On motion by Mr. Cass that the further consideration of the report be postponed until the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 37.

On motion by Mr. Atchison, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Atchison, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Houston, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Pettit, Sebastian, and Toombs.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Cass, Chase, Clay, Cooper, Dawson, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gillette, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Rockwell, Rusk, Seward, Slidell, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toucey, Wade, Walker, and Weller.

After debate, in concurrence with the report, it was Resolved, That "the right of representation under the appointment" had expired.

[It appears from the debate referred to in the head-note that the vote was reconsidered in order to allow Mr. Williams, who had been absent when the subject was first considered, to address the Senate.]

[Forty-sixth Congress—First session.]

CHARLES H. BELL,

Senator from New Hampshire from April 10, 1879, till June 20, 1879.

March 18, 1879, the credentials of Mr. Bell, appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the legislature, by the expiration of the term of Bainbridge Wadleigh, March 3, were presented. March 19, the credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. April 2, 1879, the committee reported that by reason of a change in the State constitution in 1878, two legislatures were chosen in that year, one, under the old constitution, in March, whose term of office began in June, 1878, and would terminate in May, 1879, and the other, under the new constitution, chosen in November to serve for two years, whose term would begin in June, 1879; that in the Forty-fifth Congress this committee had reported to the Senate that the last-named legislature was the one entitled to elect under the act of July 25, 1866; that the vacancy arising under these circumstances was not a vacancy "happening by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State" (Article I, section 3, of the Constitution); that until the year 1817 persons appointed to fill vacancies arising from the expiration of terms of service had been admitted to seats; but that in 1825, in the Lanman case (see page 5), "it was held, and, in the opinion of this committee, correctly, that the Constitution conferred upon the legislature, and upon it alone, the power to appoint a Senator for the beginning of a new term"; that this decision had been regarded by the Senate as final; that the case of Mr. Sevier (see page 7), in which it was claimed that the Senate had departed from the rule in Lanman's case, was in all material points different from the one under consideration, in that "the time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office under his election was decided by lot." The committee recommended the adoption of a resolution that Mr. Bell was not entitled to the seat. A minority report held that there was no historical evidence to show whether the Lanman case decided that a governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a term, or only that a governor could not lawfully make an appointment in anticipation before the vacancy had occurred; that the report in the Sevier case stated that the Lanman case proceeded upon the former ground; but that, with the exception of that statement, there is no indication that the Senate ever doubted the correctness of the construction of the Constitution that in a case where a Senator has been appointed by the executive after the happening of a vacancy by the expiration of the term without an election of a successor by the legislature, the person so appointed is entitled to the seat. April 10, the resolution reported by the committee was amended by striking out the word "not," and the Senate resolved that Mr. Bell was entitled to the seat.

Special references to the debates of each day, which are found in the Congressional Record, vol. ix, part 1, are inserted below.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1879.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of Charles H. Bell, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of New Hampshire to fill the vacancy happening in the Senate of the United States by the expiration of the term of Bainbridge Wadleigh on March 3, 1879, during the recess of the legislature of said State; which were read.

On motion by Mr. Wallace,

Ordered, That the credentials lie on the table.

[The debate is found on pages 2, 3 of the Congressional Record referred to in the head-note. In the remarks of Mr. Bell will be found a list of precedents.]

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1879.

On motion by Mr. Wallace,

Ordered, That the credentials of Charles H. Bell be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable.

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1879.

Mr. Saulsbury, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Charles H. Bell, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of New Hampshire, submitted a report (No. 1) thereon accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire."

Mr. Hoar obtained leave to submit the views of a minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections upon the credentials of Charles H. Bell; which were ordered to be printed to accompany the foregoing report.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Saulsbury (chairman), Hill of Georgia, Kernan, Bailey, Houston, Vance, Cameron of Wisconsin, Hoar, and Ingalls.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

APRIL 2, 1879.—Ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. Saulsbury, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. Charles H. Bell, claiming a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to make the following report:

The term of Bainbridge Wadleigh, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, expired by constitutional limitation on the 3d day of March, 1879, in a recess of the legislature, and on the 13th day of March, 1879, Mr. Bell was appointed in his place by the executive.

By reason of a change in the constitution of that State, which took effect in October, 1878, two legislatures were chosen in that year, one, under the old constitution, in March, whose term of office commenced in June, 1878, and will terminate in May, 1879; the other, under the new constitution, was chosen in November to serve for two years, the term commencing in June, 1879.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress, to whom was referred the question which of these two bodies had the right to choose a successor to Mr. Wadleigh, was of opinion, and so reported to the Senate, that under the act of 1866 (Revised Statues, section 14) the last-named legislature was entitled to elect, because it was the legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term of service. In the opinion of the committee this report, and the action of the Senate in adopting it, are not important in the settlement of the question now presented.

The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 3, provides as follows:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

It has been noticed that this claimant bases his right to a seat in the Senate, not upon the fact that a term filled by the legislature of New Hampshire had become vacant during a recess of the legislature, but upon the fact that the executive claims the right to make a temporary appointment at the beginning of a term which the legislature has not undertaken to fill.

The committee cannot find in the Constitution any sufficient warrant for this claim. If we look at the provision authorizing the governor to make temporary appointments independently of its connection with the rest of the section, we think it is manifest that the authority is limited to filling vacancies which happen in a term which had been previously filled by the legislature. If it was intended to vest in the executive the power to make temporary appointments to terms for which no person had been chosen by the legislature, why should the words "happen by resignation or otherwise" have been added to the word "vacancies"? They certainly did not render it more comprehensive, and must have been designed to limit and restrict its meaning to vacancies occurring from accident or some unforeseen event. If any doubt, however, existed as to the meaning of the language referred to, when considered unconnected with the rest of the section, such doubts would be removed by construing the provisions of the section together. Applying to them the rules recognized for the construction of statutes and constitutional provisions, the committee are forced to the conclusion that the legislature alone is empowered to choose a Senator upon the expiration of a Senatorial term, and that the executive can only make temporary appointments to fill vacancies occurring in a term which has been previously filled. It is well known that in the convention which framed the Constitution this subject received careful consideration. After it had been determined that the States should have equal representation in the Senate, the manner of choosing Senators was considered; various propositions were submitted, and, among others, appointments by the executives of the States. Finally it was determined to vest in the legislature the power of choosing Senators, and in the executive the power to make temporary appointments, if vacancies should happen in the office after it had been filled, until such time as the legislature could again act. This, it seems to the committee, was the obvious intent of the Constitution, gathered not only from the language of the entire section under consideration, but also from the debates in the convention in reference to its provisions.

Nothing in the history of the Senate for the last fifty years is at variance with the views here presented.

The records of the Senate show that down to the year 1817 a number of appointments were made by State executives of persons to succeed Senators whose terms of service had expired, and that the persons so appointed were admitted to seats in the Senate.

The first case was that of William Cocke, of the State of Tennessee.

This State was admitted into the Union in 1796. In the month of August of that year, William Cocke and William Blount were chosen Senators in Congress by the legislature. By lot they were assigned to the first and second classes of the three classes directed to be formed by the article of the Constitution above quoted, and Mr. Cocke having drawn the term which expired on the 3d day of March, 1797, during a recess of the legislature, was appointed by the governor to be his own successor on the 22d of April, 1797, and he was admitted to a seat without objection.

The second case was that of Uriah Tracy, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, whose term expired on the 3d of March, 1801. Under an appointment by the governor he was admitted to a seat on the 4th day of March, 1801, after a heated discussion, and by a party vote of 13 to 10.

This precedent was followed on the next day by the admission of Mr. Hindman, of Maryland; by the admission of Mr. Condit, of New Jersey, in 1803; Mr. Anderson, of Tennessee, and Mr. Smith, of Maryland, in 1809; Mr. Cutts, of New Hampshire, in 1813; and Mr. Williams, of Tennessee, in 1817; all executive appointments to fill places made vacant by the expiration of full terms of service during recesses of legislatures, and all were admitted without discussion and without objection.

But in 1825 the term of James Lanman, of Connecticut, expired during a recess of the legislature. In anticipation of the vacancy he had been appointed by the governor as his own successor. His credentials were presented on the 4th day of March, 1825, and after a protracted debate the Senate refused to admit him to a seat. No record of this debate has been preserved, and the committee have not the advantage of the reasoning by which the Senate was guided in its action. Enough, however, remains to show that the Senate decided that a vacancy authorizing an appointment by the executive had not "happened" within the meaning of the Constitution. It was held, and, in the opinion of this committee, correctly, that the Constitution conferred upon the legislature, and upon it alone, the power to appoint a Senator for the beginning of a new term; and it seems to the committee that this decision is clearly in accord with the spirit and meaning of the article of the Constitution already quoted.

This section confers upon the legislature the right, and imposes upon it the duty, of choosing Senators who are to serve for six years.

In every one of the States a legislature must be in session at some time preceding the expiration of a Senatorial term. We know as a fact that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution these sessions were mostly annual, and, as now, those not annual were biennial. After the first assignment of Senators to classes, the term of office was fixed, and, under the Constitution, would expire at a time certain. When, therefore, the first clause of the third section, first article of the Constitution directed that Senators should be chosen by the legislatures, it appears most manifestly to have been the purpose of its framers to give exclusive power to the legislature to make the choice, unless, as provided by the last clause, vacancies should "happen" by resignation, or otherwise, during a recess of the legislature, when the executive should make temporary appointments until the next session of the legislature.

The power to make temporary appointments was conferred upon the executive because the accidents of death, resignation, expulsion, or acceptance of another office could not be foreseen or provided for by the legislature. In the one class of cases the time when a term would expire was fixed by law and was well known. There could be no doubt or uncertainty in regard to it, and in such case a vacancy could occur only by the willful disregard by the State in framing its organic law, or by the legislature, of constitutional obligations. In such case a vacancy could not "happen," or occur by chance, casualty, or other event that could not be guarded against.

The decision in Lanman's case has been for more than fifty years regarded as a correct exposition of the Constitution. During this long lapse of years its authority has not been questioned, and it has guided the action of legislatures and of executives of States.

Many cases have occurred when, under like circumstances, for months, and in some instances for one or two years, and even a longer time, States have been represented upon the floor of the Senate by a single Senator, and for the reason that the decision in Lanman's case was regarded as final and conclusive of the question. The following are cases of this character:

Cases of unfilled seats or vacancies at beginning of Senatorial terms by reason of non-election.

Maine.—Vacancy from March 4, 1853, till February 23, 1854, when William Pitt Fessenden took the seat under an election.

Connecticut.—Vacancy from March 4, 1851, to May 12, 1852, when Isaac Toucey presented credentials of election by legislature.

Pennsylvania.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to January 18, 1856, when William Bigler was seated on an election by the legislature.

Maryland.—Vacancy from March 4, 1843, to January 2, 1844, when James Alfred Pearce, elected by the legislature, took the seat.

North Carolina.—Vacancy from March 4, 1853, to December 6, 1854, when David S. Reid's certificate of election was presented.

Indiana.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to February 4, 1857, when Graham N. Fitch was admitted on credentials of legislative election, which was contested, and the contest not decided till late in the spring of 1858.

Missouri.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to January 12, 1857, when James S. Green was admitted on a legislative election.

California.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to February 15, 1857, when William M. Gwin presented himself under an election by the legislature.

Oregon.—Vacancy from March 3, 1859, until December 5, 1860, when Edward D. Baker took the seat under a legislative election.

It is said, however, that the Senate departed from the rule in Lanman's case in the case of Mr Sevier, appointed as his own successor by the governor of Arkansas in the year 1837.

The report in this case, made by a committee of the Senate, shows that the State of Arkansas was admitted into the Union in the year 1836, and in September of that year elected two Senators, Mr. Sevier and Mr. Fulton. Under the constitutional rule Mr. Fulton was allotted to the second class of Senators and Mr. Sevier to the third, and his term of service expired on the 3d day of March, 1837, during a recess of the legislature.

A committee of the Senate, to whom the credentials of Mr. Sevier were referred, after quoting the decision in Lanman's case, say:

"The decision seems to have been generally acquiesced in, nor is it intended by the committee to call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is that the legislature of a State, by making an election themselves, shall provide for all vacancies that must occur at stated or known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution."

And the committee concludes by saying:

"The case under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office under his election * * * was decided by lot under the provisions of the Constitution on that subject, * * * and therefore they recommend that Mr. Sevier be admitted."

The case in its facts was identical with that of Mr. Cocke, of Tennessee, settled in 1797, but in all material points differs from the one now under consideration.

The committee, from every view of the case, are forced to the conclusion that the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of Senator Wadleigh cannot be filled by executive appointment, and therefore report the following resolution, and recommend its passage:

Resolved, That the Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Hon. Charles H. Bell, claiming to be admitted as a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, dissent from the conclusions of a majority of the committee.

The Constitution, Article I, section 3, provides as follows:

1 A.

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The term of office of the Hon. Bainbridge Wadleigh, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, expired on the 3d day of March, 1879.

By the statute of the United States, approved July 25, 1866, re-enacted Revised Statutes, 814, it is provided:

"The legislature of each State, which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress, shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress."

Under the new constitution of New Hampshire a legislature was chosen in November, 1878, for a term to begin in June, 1879. That legislature cannot elect a Senator until June, 1879, because by the constitution of the State its legislative powers will not vest until then. Its predecessor could not elect a Senator at its last session, and cannot now, if called together in special session, because it was not the legislature last chosen before the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term.

The governor of New Hampshire, on the 13th of March, 1879, made temporary appointment of the Hon. Charles H. Bell until the next meeting of the legislature. Mr. Bell now presents himself to claim the seat. The only question is, has a vacancy happened by "resignation or otherwise," so that the executive was authorized to make this appointment?

We are aided in determining this question by considering the leading purpose of the constitutional provision, the natural meaning of the words, and the uniform construction given to similar language used elsewhere in the Constitution and the previous judgments of the Senate in like cases.

The purpose of the Constitution is to have the Senate always full. This is the interest not merely of the State whose right to elect is in question, but of the whole country, for whom the Senator is to legislate, whose servant he is, and to whom his service is due. To this end the Constitution provides that "the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State," and authorizes Congress to make regulations as to the time and manner of electing them. Congress has exercised this authority in the statutes cited, so that no failure of duty of either branch of the legislature may interrupt the State's representation in the Senate. To meet the case of a vacancy happening in the recess of the State legislature the Constitution clothes the executive with the power of temporary appointment. The purpose to keep the representation of the State always full requires the construction which authorizes such appointment when the vacancy happens at the beginning of the term as much as if it happen at any other time. The authority given to the governor is to appoint "until the next meeting of the legislature," which literally construed would require the Senator so appointed to vacate his seat on the day the legislature meet. Yet the Senate, in furtherance of the controlling purpose of the Constitution that the place shall be always full, has uniformly held that the Senator so appointed retains his seat until the legislature choose his successor or adjourn without making a choice.

The authority to appoint is vested in the executive "if a vacancy happen." There is no distinction indicated between vacancies which happen when the term begins and vacancies which happen later. There can be no reason suggested for such a distinction. It is said that the term "vacancy" is not properly applied to offices whose term has expired by limitation at a fixed time but only to terms which have once been filled.

But the Constitution expressly declares "the seats of the Senators shall be vacated at the expiration of the sixth year," &c. Did the Constitution mean to declare that to vacate a seat does not create a vacancy in it?

But it is said a vacancy which occurs at a certain time fixed by law is not a vacancy which "happens"; that the Constitution meant only to vest the appointing power in the executive in case of the vacancy occurring by reason of events which cannot be certainly foreseen; and this is the strong point of those who differ with us. On the contrary, we affirm that nothing is better settled in the construction of the Constitution and of legislation under it than that the words "vacancies happening" include the case of offices which have a fixed term which has expired, and which are vacant because no new appointment has been made. Article 2, section 2, of the Constitution, in its provision for the appointment of officers, declares:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Under this provision the President exercises the undisputed power of filling offices which have a term fixed by law which expires in the recess of Congress. Most important rights of the people and of private citizens depend on the legality of such appointments which the construction contended for by the majority of the committee must overturn. In Revised Statutes, section 1769, "the President is authorized to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death, or resignation, or expiration of term of office."

It is not the ending of the term, but the absence from the office of any person authorized to fill it, to which the word "happen," which expresses contingency, is applied. It is certain that the term will end. It is still uncertain whether the office will be vacant, because that depends on the contingent event of the legislature's having filled it. It is in accordance with the custom of our language to apply the word "happen" to the simultaneous occurrence of two events, both of which are certain to take place. "If the fourth of July happen on Sunday, the next day shall be a legal holiday." "If the last day of grace happen to be a holiday, the note shall be payable on the day preceding." A fortiori the word may be appropriately used to express the occurrence at the same time of two events, one of which is contingent. If there happen to be no Senator in the office, the authority of the executive exists.

The question has frequently arisen for judgment in the Senate. By a line of decisions unbroken, with one possible exception, it has been held that the governor of a State is authorized to fill a vacancy existing at the beginning of a Senatorial term.

April 27, 1797, William Cocke was appointed a Senator from the State of Tennessee by the governor, his term having expired on the third of the preceding month. On the 15th of May, 1797, he presented his credentials, and was admitted to take the oath of office without objection or debate.

March 3, 1801, the seat of Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, became vacant by the expiration of his term of office. On the 20th of February, 1801, the governor of Connecticut reappointed him a Senator. Objection being raised to his credentials, he was admitted to the oath by a vote of yeas 13, nays 10.

William Hindman, of Maryland, was afterward, on the next day, admitted to the oath on like credentials, without objection.

John Condit, of New Jersey, November 14, 1803, appointed a Senator from New Jersey to fill the vacancy at the beginning of the term, was admitted to take the oath. Mr Condit's credentials had been presented October 17, previous.

March 4, 1809, Samuel Smith, of Maryland, appointed on that day by the governor of his State to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of his own term, was admitted to his seat and sworn.

March 4, 1809, Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, took his seat by virtue of an appointment from the governor of that State.

May 24, 1813, Charles Cutts, of New Hampshire, appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy during the recess of the legislature, was, without question, admitted to take the oath. This vacancy was at the beginning of the term.

March 4, 1817, John Williams, of Tennessee, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State, to hold said appointment until the meeting of the next session of the legislature, was admitted. His credentials were filed on the 10th of the preceding February.

March 4, 1825, James Lanman, of Connecticut, presented his credentials of his appointment by the governor of that State, "to take effect immediately after the 3d of March, 1825, and to hold the seat until the next meeting of the legislature." Mr. Lanman was refused the seat by a vote of 23 to 13. The case was referred to a select committee, who report the facts, but state neither reason nor conclusion. The committee say they have looked into the journals of the Senate, and that the cases of Cocke, Tracy, Anderson, and Williams are the only analogous cases they could find. There is a brief sketch of the debate in Niles' Register, vol. 28, page 32, but no statement of the reason on which any Senator proceeded. There is no historical evidence from which we can determine whether the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of the term, or on the ground that the governor could not lawfully make the appointment in anticipation, before the vacancy occurred, and before he could possibly know whether the legislature might be called together before that time. All the precedents which the committee cite, except that of Mr. Cocke, were cases where the appointment was made not when the vacancy happened in the recess of the legislature, but only when the governor thought it might happen. In the case of Cocke the date of the appointment is not given in the journals, although in fact it was after the vacancy. The committee do not cite the case of Hindman, Smith, or Condit, nor the then recent case of Cutts, in deciding which some Senators then in office took part, where the appointments were made after the vacancy existed. There is, therefore, nothing to show whether the Senate meant to overrule all the precedents, some of which were not brought to its attention, or only so many of them as recognized the right of the executive to appoint when a vacancy had not happened.

Judge Story (Constitution, § 727, note 2) says:

"In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, a question occurred whether the State executive could make an appointment in the recess of the State legislature in anticipation of the expiration of the term of office of an existing Senator. It was decided by the Senate that he could not make such an appointment. The facts were that Mr. Lanman's term of service as Senator expired on the 3d of March, 1825. The President had convoked the Senate to meet on the 4th of March. The governor of Connecticut, in the recess of the legislature (whose session would be in May), on the 9th of the preceding February appointed Mr. Lanman as Senator, to sit in the Senate after the 3d of March. The Senate, by a vote of 23 to 18, decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred." (See Gordon's Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1827; appendix, note 1, B.)

In regard to the same case, the National Intelligencer of March 8, 1825, says in an editorial note:

"An important constitutional question was yesterday decided in the Senate by the refusal to admit Mr. Lanman to a seat in the Senate under a commission from the governor granted before the expiration of Mr. Lanman's late term of service. This is the first time the question has been adjudicated under such circumstances as to form a precedent; and we presume it may now be considered as a settled construction of the constitutional provision that a vacancy must have literally 'happened' or come to pass before an appointment can be made to fill it."

The State of Arkansas was admitted to the Union in 1836. In October, 1836, the legislature of that State elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators. On the allotment of the Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, Mr. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1837. The legislature of Arkansas had no opportunity to fill the vacancy, and were not in session after the result of the allotment was known in that State. January 17, 1837, the governor of Arkansas appointed Mr. Sevier to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. When Mr. Sevier's credentials were presented at the winter session, Mr. Webster suggested a doubt of the validity of the appointment, in which Mr. Sevier himself concurred. At the March session the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Grundy, from that committee, reported in favor of Mr. Sevier's admission, and he was admitted.

Mr. Grundy's report states that it is not intended by the committee to call in question the correctness of the decision in the Lanman case; that that case proceeded on the ground "that the legislature should provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution."

The report further says:

"The case now under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot."

From this review of the judgments of the Senate, it appears that in every case in which a Senator has been appointed by the executive after the happening of a vacancy by the expiration of a term without an election of a successor by the legislature, the person so appointed has been admitted to his seat. There is no indication that the Senate ever denied or doubted the correctness of this construction of the Constitution, except the unsupported statement of Mr. Grundy of the ground of a decision made twelve years before—a statement which nothing in the journal of the debates confirms, and which is opposed to the understanding of Judge Story and the contemporaneous article in the Intelligencer.

The second section of the first article of the Constitution provides: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." In 1837, the law of Mississippi fixed the time for the election of Representatives in November. The President having called a special session of Congress to meet in September, the governor of Mississippi, on the 13th of June, issued writs for an election in July for two Representatives to Congress to fill said vacancy, until superseded by the members to be elected at the next regular election in November,

At this July election Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne were elected and claimed the seats. Their claim was referred to a committee, of which Andrew Buchanan was chairman, who reported in favor of their right to seats for the full term. They say in their report:

"The Constitution authorizes the executive power of the States respectively to order the filling of all vacancies which have actually happened, in the mode therein pointed out, no matter how the vacancy may have happened, whether by death, resignation, or expiration of the term of members previous to the election of their successors."

In the debate, John Quincy Adams said he believed, in relation to offices, that every one happens to be vacant which is not full; and that, he believed, was the meaning and sense of the Constitution, whether the vacancy occurred from casualty, the regular course of events, expiration of term, or other cause.

The claimants were admitted to their seats. In November following, Messrs. Prentiss and Wood were elected for the same term. At the next December session, the resolution declaring Gholson and Claiborne elected was rescinded, but a resolution was also adopted, by the casting vote of Speaker James K. Polk, that Prentiss and Wood were not members. So that no inference can properly be drawn from that case; and it is of no value, except so far as weight may be attached to the opinions of John Quincy Adams and James K. Polk, both favoring the construction of the Constitution for which we contend.

Appended to the report in the Mississippi case are opinions of two of the most distinguished Attorneys-General of the United States, Roger B. Taney and William Wirt, in which they discuss the meaning of the phrase "vacancies that may happen during the recess" with reference to the power of the President to fill an office which is vacant in the recess, because the Senate adjourned without acting on a nomination, the original vacancy having happened during the session. Both these eminent jurists agree that the term "happen" is equivalent to "happen to exist," "if it come to pass that there be a vacancy." Mr. Taney says:

"The Constitution was formed for practical purposes, and a construction that defeats the very object of the grant of power cannot be a true one. It was the intention of the Constitution that the offices created by law should always be full."

We submit, therefore, that the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed, the purpose which the framers of the Constitution meant to accomplish, the unbroken current of decisions in like cases, and the uniform construction given to the same language when used elsewhere in the Constitution and in legislation in like cases, concur in supporting the interpretation which establishes Mr. Bell's claim. The office of Senator is a continuous office. When the Senator is duly elected by the legislature beforehand no vacancy exists within the meaning of the Constitution. His taking the oath of office relates back to the beginning of the term and preserves the continuousness of the succession. He is when on his way to take the oath deemed to be a Senator and privileged from arrest. A vacancy happens, and only happens, when the legislature has failed to make due election, or the person chosen declines the appointment, or when the office once filled is vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise.

But if we adopt the narrowest possible construction imputed by Mr. Grundy in the Sevier report, the decision in the case of Lanman, the doctrine of the Sevier decision itself, is enough for the purpose of this case. If the failure of the Arkansas legislature to be in session after the expiration of Mr. Sevier's term was decided by lot made the vacancy contingent in the narrowest sense of that term, so that the governor could appoint, certainly the fact that there is no legislature in the State able to act constitutes such a contingency. Whether it so happens that the person once chosen is unable to remain in office, or it so happens that the legislature cannot meet and choose, the contingency of a vacancy in the office has occurred. The six months at the end of the term are no more important than six months at its beginning. The Constitution makes equally careful provision for either.

THURSDAY, April 3, 1879.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, declaring that Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment of the governor of New Hampshire.

On motion by Mr. Hoar to amend the resolution by striking out, after the word "is," the word "not,"

Pending debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to Monday next.

MONDAY, April 7, 1879.

The Senate resumed, &c.

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hoar.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1879.

The Senate resumed, &c.

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hoar.

WEDNESDAY, April 9, 1879.

The Senate resumed, &c.

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hoar.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1879.

The Vice-President announced that the morning hour had expired, and called up the unfinished business of the Senate at its adjournment yesterday, viz, the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, April 2, 1879, declaring "that Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire"; and

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hoar, viz: After the word "is" strike out the word "not,"

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chandler, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Gordon, Groome, Hamlin, Hill of Colorado, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kellogg, Kirkwood, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Morrill, Paddock, Platt, Plumb, Randolph, Rollins, Saunders, Teller, Voorhees, Walker, White, and Williams.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bailey, Call, Carpenter, Cockrell, Coke, Conkling, Davis of Illinois, Eaton, Farley, Garland, Grover, Harris, Hereford, Hill of Georgia, Houston, Johnston, Jonas, Kernan, Lamar, Maxey, Morgan, Pendleton, Ransom, Slater, Vance, Vest, Wallace, and Withers.

So the amendment was agreed to.

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, as follows:

"Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire,"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chandler, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Gordon, Groome, Hamlin, Hill of Colorado, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kellogg, Kirkwood, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Morrill, Paddock, Platt, Plumb, Randolph, Rollins, Saulsbury, Saunders, Teller, Voorhees, Walker, Whyte, and Williams.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bailey, Call, Carpenter, Cockrell, Coke, Conkling, Davis of Illinois, Eaton, Farley, Garland, Grover, Harris, Hereford, Hill of Georgia, Houston, Johnston, Jonas, Kernan, Lamar, Maxey, Morgan, Pendleton, Ransom, Slater, Vance, Vest, Wallace, and Withers.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. Charles H. Bell then appeared, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Vice-President, he took his seat in the Senate.

MILEAGE OF MR. BELL.

THURSDAY, June 19, 1879.

Mr. Saulsbury, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay Hon. Charles H. Bell mileage at the rate allowed by law for attendance at this session, the same to be paid out of the 'miscellaneous items' of the contingent fund."

FRIDAY, June 20, 1879.

Mr. Rollins presented the credentials of Henry W. Blair, elected a Senator by the legislature of New Hampshire for the unexpired portion of the term of six years commencing March 4, 1879; which were read.

Mr. Blair then appeared, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the President pro tempore, he took his seat in the Senate.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1885.]

HENRY W. BLAIR,

Senator from New Hampshire from June 20, 1879, to March 3, 1891.

March 9, 1885, the credentials of Mr. Blair, appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the legislature by the expiration of his previous term, March 3, were presented. A motion that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was determined in the negative. A resolution was then submitted that he be admitted to take the oath of office, which was agreed to March 10. It appears from the debates that the case presented the same questions presented by the case of Charles H. Bell (see page 26); that a legislature was elected in November, 1882, to serve for two years, whose term of office began in June, 1883; that another legislature was elected in November, 1884, to serve for two years, whose term of office would begin in June, 1885; that the legislature elected in 1882, acting in accordance with its interpretation of the act of July 25, 1866, and in accordance with a report of this committee made in the Forty-fifth Congress on the same subject, had not elected a successor to Mr. Blair; that the question was whether a vacancy arising under such circumstances was a vacancy "happening by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State." (Article I, section 3, of the Constitution.) Extracts from remarks given below will show the grounds upon which different Senators proceeded.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 48th Cong., 2d sess. (special session, March and April, 1885), and extracts from remarks of Senators.

The debates are found in the Senate proceedings of March 9 and 10, 1885, in the Congressional Record, vol. xvii, part 1, pages 4 to 6 and 16 to 26.

MONDAY, March 9, 1885.

Mr. Pike presented the credentials of Henry W. Blair, appointed a Senator by the governor of New Hampshire to fill the vacancy in the representation from that State happening March 4, 1885, during the recess of the legislature.

The credentials were read; and,

On motion by Mr. Vest that they be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. Hoar thereupon submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Henry W. Blair, appointed a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, be now admitted to take the oath of office,"

When,

On motion by Mr. Harris, and by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That the consideration of the resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1885.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. Hoar, that Henry W. Blair be now admitted to take the oath of office as a Senator from the State of New Hampshire; and

On the question to agree to the resolution,

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 36, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. Vest, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Aldrich, Allison, Cameron, Chace, Conger, Cullom, Dawes, Edmunds, Evarts, Frye, Hale, Harrison, Hoar, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McMillan, Mahone, Manderson, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Mitchell, Morrill, Palmer, Pike, Platt, Riddleberger, Sabin, Sawyer, Sewell, Sherman, Spooner, Stanford, Teller, Van Wyck, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Beck, Blackburn, Camden, Cockrell, Coke, Eustis, Gibson, Gorman, Jackson, Jones of Arkansas, Kenna, McPherson, Maxey, Morgan, Payne, Pugh, Ransom, Saulsbury, Vance, and Vest.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Henry W. Blair then appeared, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Vice-President, he took his seat in the Senate.

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Vest, of Missouri, in opposition to the resolution submitted by Mr. Hoar that Mr. Blair be admitted to take the oath of office. Found in the proceedings of March 10, 1885, in the Congressional Record, vol. xvii, part 1, p. 16.]

"Mr. President, yesterday I asked that the resolution should go over until to-day in order that it might be examined by the new Senators just sworn into this body, and in order that those of us who were members at the time the Bell case was under discussion and was determined should have an opportunity to refresh our recollection in regard to the points then made and discussed. It is not my purpose to enter into a lengthy résumé of that argument then so exhaustively made. I simply wish to say now that I reaffirm what was my conclusion then as a lawyer in regard to this subject.

"I voted on the Bell case that Mr. Bell was not entitled to a seat in this body; that the governor of a State had no right to fill an entire term by original appointment; that the meaning of the Constitution, which declares 'if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State' the executive authority of a State may make a temporary appointment, is that when a vacancy shall occur, not by operation of law, but by some event which applies to the individual asking for the office or applying for admission into this body, by the resignation of a person, by death operating upon him, and that the word 'otherwise' in that connection means by similar casualty—when a vacancy shall happen, when it shall occur, not by operation of statute or of any constitution, but when it occurs by resignation, death, or otherwise.

"The terms of the Constitution as originally made—and I shall be very brief in the discussion of the subject, for I only propose to give my own reasons for casting my vote—the terms of the Constitution are:

"'If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy.'

"There are three clauses in the Federal Constitution in which the word 'happen' is used. First, in Article II, section 2, the Constitution says:

"'The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.'

"Article I, section 2, provides:

"'When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.'

"Article I, section 3, which is the clause now under discussion, provides:

"'And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"In all three of these clauses the word 'happen' is used, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the first two clauses in regard to vacancies in the House of Representatives and vacancies during a recess of the Senate as to executive officers, the word 'happen' is without limitation, 'where vacancies shall happen,' and there is the termination of the power of the President in regard to executive appointments; but in regard to Senators the Federal Convention put a limitation upon the word 'happen.' They did not stop with declaring where vacancies may happen during a recess of a legislature that then the governor may appoint, but where a vacancy shall happen by resignation or otherwise.

"If the Senators now present are correct who claim the power of a governor to exist to appoint in these cases, we are forced to the conclusion that the words 'by resignation or otherwise' are void and meaningless as used by the framers of the Constitution, or else that the terms are a limitation upon the word 'happen.' They are not found in the other two clauses of the Constitution. What makes this argument more significant and conclusive to my mind is that the original draught of the Constitution, which I have before me, and the debates show that the clause as originally reported to the convention of 1787 was absolute and unlimited, when a vacancy should occur, and Mr. Madison moved to put in these terms of limitation, that where the vacancy should occur by resignation or otherwise, or equivalent terms, then the governor of the State might appoint.

"I know it has been said that contemporaneous construction at the time militates against this view. In the debate which occurred in the Bell case an editorial was read from the National Intelligencer of March 8, 1825, and it was said that this had been adopted by Judge Story and by Mr. Gordon, who was compiling a book in regard to the proceedings of Congress at that time. The most authoritative statement in regard to the meaning of Congress and the debates of Congress at that time is found in Niles's Register, the authority of which I take it will not be questioned on this floor. In Niles's Register I find the following:

"'The following members'—

"Says the Register of March 12, 1825—

"'The following members, also re-elected for six years from this day, took the oath of office, namely: Mr. Lloyd, of Maryland; Mr. Macon, of North Carolina; Mr. Guillard, of South Carolina; Mr. J. S. Johnston, of Louisiana; and Mr. Barton, of Missouri.

"'Some conversation took place on the case of Mr. Lanman, reappointed by the governor in the recess of the legislature, the question being, whether a failure by the legislature to make a choice of a Senator constitutes the contingency in which a governor may appoint a Senator, the language of the Constitution being, "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise," &c.'

"It is said, and conspicuously by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar], that the quotation in the National Intelligencer and in the book by Gordon showed that the Lanman case decided in 1825 did not touch this question, did not determine it, and that the Lanman case, a case from Connecticut, went off on the power of the governor to make an appointment before the vacancy existed. Niles's Register asserts emphatically that the very point now at issue before the Senate was decided in 1825. I know that other cases were decided antecedent to the Lanman case, but they were decided, I affirm, without discussion, without debate.

"In 1825 this precise case was brought before the Senate of the United States, and it was decided then that the governor could not appoint as to a full term. In 1825 for the first time this question was elaborately and exhaustively debated by the ablest lawyers then in the United States, and it was decided that the governor did not have the right to make such an appointment; and I say to-day, as was said in the Bell discussion, that from 1825 to the decision of the Bell case in 1879 not one solitary utterance was ever heard upon this floor or elsewhere which questioned the accuracy of the position I take here now.

"I know it is said that the Sevier case from Arkansas, decided in 1837, antagonizes this view; but the report of Mr. Felix Grundy on the Sevier case asserted that that decision was not in antagonism to the Lanman decision, but that it was made upon the express ground that Sevier had drawn his seat by lot, and that therefore the term "happen" applied to that case; but Mr. Grundy expressly says, and I have his report before me as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that the Lanman case was the precedent; that it decided the correct doctrine, and it was held so invariably until the decision of the Senate in 1879.

"Mr. Wadleigh, from New Hampshire, in discussing this very question admitted that the Lanman case was decisive of the whole matter. Says Mr. Wadleigh:

"'The Senator from Ohio'—

"Referring to Mr. Thurman—

"'The Senator from Ohio would have us believe that there is some doubt as to whether this legislature or the next is entitled to elect. That is a matter which greatly concerns the people of New Hampshire. It is desirable that that question should be settled at once, so that they may not put themselves in a position from which they cannot be extricated without great embarrassment. Accordingly a bill was presented to this body by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Cameron] and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which reported unanimously that this legislature cannot elect the Senator, that the next legislature must elect. That shows to us clearly that unless this bill passes there must be a vacancy in this Senate from the State of New Hampshire for three months in the next Congress.'

"In other words, that the governor could not fill the vacancy; and there is upon the other side of this Chamber a succession of weighty authority in the same direction. Mr. Thurman asked:

"'Is there any probability of Congress being in session during those three months?

"'Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not know about that.

"'Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire why the governor of New Hampshire cannot appoint for the vacancy until the legislature meets in June?

"'Mr. BLAINE. He cannot do that if the previous term has fully expired.'

"Which is the very case here.

"'Mr. WHYTE. Suppose this legislature has power to elect and does not elect, is not that a vacancy?

"'Mr. BLAINE. Then the power of the governor does not come in.

"'Mr. WHYTE. It does, apparently.

"'Mr. BLAINE. Not at all.

"'Mr. DAWES. Every precedent of the Senate is against that.

"'Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maryland is too good a lawyer to make that assertion.

"'Mr. WADLEIGH. Having examined the precedents, I am inclined to think the governor cannot appoint.

"'Mr. BLAINE. Of course the governor cannot appoint. Nothing is better settled than that. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] will give his assent to that, if the term has fully expired.'

"Never until the Bell decision by the Senate was any voice ever raised from 1825 to 1879 which gave to the governor of a State the right to fill a full term.

"I remember very well in the Bell discussion when Senator Conkling, of New York, put a question to Senator Hill, of Georgia, in regard to the power of the governor to fill the term. Senator Conkling said: 'If that power exists, the governor, by collusion with a majority of the legislature, could from time to time put off an election and fill the vacancy out of his own creatures and to suit himself.' Senator Hill replied to him that that was the identical argument which he proposed to make, and that that was the meaning of the constitutional provision, which did not give this power to the executive of a State.

"But if I had any doubt about the meaning of the Lanman decision, I find it in Mr. Benton's Thirty Years' View, and he was the most accurate man who ever wrote in this country in regard to the proceedings of this body or the other. Mr. Benton says:

"'Mr. Lanman has served a regular term as Senator from Connecticut. His term of service expired on the 3d of March of this year, and the general assembly of the State having failed to make an election of Senator in his place, he received a temporary appointment from the governor. On presenting himself to take the oath of office, on the 4th day of March, being the first day of the special Senatorial session convoked by the retiring President (Mr. Monroe) according to usage for the inauguration of his successor, his appointment was objected to as not having been made in a case in which a governor of a State could fill a vacancy by making a temporary appointment. Mr. Tazewell was the principal speaker against the validity of the appointment, arguing against it both on the words of the Constitution and the reason for the provision. The words of the Constitution are: "If vacancies happen (in the Senate) by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments, until the next meeting of the legislature." "Happen" was held by Mr. Tazewell to be the governing word in this provision, and it always implied a contingency, and an unexpected one. It could not apply to a foreseen event, bound to occur at a fixed period. Here the vacancy was foreseen; there was no contingency in it. It was regular and certain. It was the right of the legislature to fill it, and if they failed, no matter from what cause, there was no right in the governor to supply their omission. The Senators voting in favor of the motion were, &c.'

"Showing from the highest authority that in the Lanman case the identical point at issue here to-day was raised and decided and remained an unbroken precedent from 1825 to 1879.

"But, Mr. President, more than that, and I am speaking as rapidly as possible, for this question has been fully exhausted, and I think the decision in the Bell case will be affirmed here again to-day; and I merely make this statement, as I said before, in order to affirm my own established opinion upon this question and the reasons which I have for it, it has always been held here, it has never been for one instant contradicted, that if the legislature of a State had been in session which could have filled the vacancy, and had the power to fill the vacancy, and refused to do it under the Constitution, then the governor could not possibly have the power to appoint. Now, the legislature of New Hampshire has been in session; the legislature of New Hampshire has had the power to fill this vacancy. The legislature of New Hampshire applied to the supreme court of that State, under the constitution of New Hampshire, to ascertain whether the power existed in the legislative assembly. The supreme court declared to them that the power did exist. They deliberately refused to exercise it; they adjourned; and now it is claimed, in view of these facts, that the chief executive of that State has the right, as I hold, in direct contravention of the terms and spirit of the Constitution, to fill a full term, and that that power exists not ex vi termini upon those terms, but according to the meaning of the Constitution itself.

"This is all I desire to say, sir. I shall vote against this gentleman's admission, believing the precedent in the Lanman case to be the correct one; and I shall do so the more cheerfully because I am not ashamed to be found as a lawyer in company with the memory of Carpenter, of Wisconsin, with the opinion of Judge Davis, of Illinois, who voted with me, and with the present Attorney-General of the United States, who made a learned and exhaustive argument upon the same side. I am not ashamed to assert the same opinion in that company and to give feebly the reasons which were then uttered."

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts, in support of the resolution submitted by him that Mr. Blair be admitted to take the oath of office. Found in the proceedings of March 10, 1885, in the Congressional Record, vol. xvii, part 1, p. 17.]

"Mr. President, I do not think it will be profitable to enter upon the very wide field of discussion which the question involved in this case opens. I think the Senate will prefer to rest its decision to-day upon the authority of one of the most authoritative precedents which have occurred in its history.

"If a legislative body exercising quasi-judicial functions like that which is exercised when the Senate determines the right of a claimant to a seat here can ever be bound by a precedent, the Senate has bound itself by the precedent established in the case of Mr. Bell. It was established on full discussion by great lawyers and great Senators. It was established by a decisive majority, in which the division was totally non-partisan. The great debaters and lawyers to whom my honorable friend from Missouri alluded who differed with the majority of the Senate on that occasion put forth some of their ablest and best intellectual efforts, rendering it certain that the decision to which the Senate then arrived was a decision moved in view of every reason which could be suggested bearing upon the question.

"The people of the State of New Hampshire have governed themselves and must govern themselves and had a right to govern themselves by the decision which the Senate then made, and nobody can hope that if by a slight majority that decision should be reversed to-day it would stand reversed. Therefore the people of the State of New Hampshire and of all other States where like questions may arise would find themselves in the condition of being compelled to act one way one year and another another, as the changing majority or opinion of the Senate may decide this case and that as it should come up year after year.

"When the question which now arises came up six years ago there were found voting in favor of the right, and of course of the duty and obligation, of the governor of a State to appoint a Senator in a case like this gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber. There was the distinguished gentleman who now sits at the left of my friend from Missouri, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees], in that vote, relying, as I have no doubt he did, on the decision of one of the very ablest judges then pronouncing the opinion of the supreme court of his own State on the intepretation of precisely or substantially similar language. There was found Mr. Bayard, the present Secretary of State; Mr. Gordon, of Georgia; Mr. Groome, of Maryland; Mr. Jones, of Florida, now occupying a seat in the Senate; Mr. McDonald, then representing also the State of Indiana; Mr. Randolph, of New Jersey; Mr. Walker, of Arkansas, and Mr. W. Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, who inherited both the name and blood and largely the capacity of one of the greatest constitutional lawyers who ever occupied a seat in this body.

"Now, I think it is enough to rest this case upon the consideration that if the Senate can adjudge anything it has adjudged this; but perhaps it may not be improper to take a very few minutes, not in a discussion in detail, but in a mere statement of the history of this constitutional question.

"The Constitution of the United States contains this provision, which I submit is the controlling and governing provision, that the several States of the Union shall have an equal and constant power in the Senate of the United States by the representation with which two Senators are clothed. That is what the Constitution means to effect. There is not a full Senate, there is not a State represented and having its equal right and authority in the Senate when any single seat is vacant. To that end the Constitution provides as a mechanism for carrying out and accomplishing the purpose that these seats shall always be full, and that every State in this body shall be the equal of every other State. The provision is that the legislature shall choose their Senators—

"'And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"This language verbatim is repeated in the Constitution in another place, where it is provided that if vacancies happen in any executive office during a recess of the Senate the President shall have the power to make an appointment until the next session. Under that provision time out of mind, originally on the authority of William Wirt and I believe John Marshall, the President of the United States has been held without dispute to have the right to appoint to an office the legal or constitutional term of whose incumbency ends when Congress is not in session.

"Here, therefore, are two sentences in the Constitution, one intended to preserve the continuance of executive power by the discharge of the duties of the subordinate executive officer, and the other intended to preserve the continuance of legislative power by keeping the Senate full, in regard to which the Senator from Missouri is compelled to claim that there is a totally different meaning. If the executive office is vacant, the small, the subordinate, which does not affect the functions of the Government or the equality of the States, or the completeness of one of the two great legislative bodies of the country, it means that if there happen, or if it so be that there is no officer in existence authorized to exercise those functions, then the President may appoint. And yet the Senator claims that the same language means a totally different thing in the case of the Senate.

"Well, Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his interruption. The Senator concedes that a vacancy has happened, within the constitutional meaning of that term, in the representation of the State of New Hampshire. Now, as I understand, he puts his argument solely on the ground that the words which were intended to mean, in my judgment, if a vacancy shall happen in any possible way, that is by resignation (which is one ordinary way of creating a vacancy) or in any other method whatever, then the right of the governor to fill the Senatorial office by appointment exists, do not apply to this case. Now, it seems to me, and I submit to the good sense of that Senator himself, that it is utterly incredible, first that the founders of the Constitution should ever have intended to let the Senate be full if the vacancy happened during a term and that it should be vacant until a legislature should meet if a vacancy happened at the beginning of a term. It is utterly incredible that they should have entertained that purpose; but entertaining that purpose, it is still more incredible that any one of the learned lawers and able statesmen who framed the Constitution could have undertaken to effectuate it by such language as he has described. Just think of Mr. Madison desiring to provide that this power of the governor of a State to keep full the representation of his State in the Senate should have a limitation upon it that he should not exercise it at the beginning of a constitutional term, and having in mind the limitation and the restraint that he should have undertaken to express it, and to give legal and constitutional effect to it, by simply adding the words, 'by resignation or otherwise.' He would have said, 'by resignation, and not otherwise,' if he had intended to give constitutional effect to that idea.

"The Constitution using, I repeat, substantially the same language to provide for the two cases if a vacancy shall happen, the Senator is driven to say that 'happen' means one thing in case of the Senatorial office and another thing in the case of the executive office. But conceding that the words have the same meaning, he undertakes to resort to language intended to amplify, to make clear, to make universal in the important case of the Senator the existence of the power, and claims that that is used as a limitation or restriction!

"Mr. President, the framers of the Constitution, and the men who filled these seats from the beginning to the year 1825, beyond any question took the view of the matter which was taken by the Senate in the Bell case; and it is conceded, as the Senator from Missouri himself has conceded, that in ten instances Senators were appointed and took and held their seats in consequence of the exercise of the authority of the executives of their States at the beginning of a constitutional term, when the legislature for any reason had failed to provide by an election. These cases are all cited in the report which was made in the case of Mr. Bell six years ago.

"The first is the case of William Cocke, of the State of Tennessee. The State being admitted into the Union in 1796, Cocke having drawn the term which expired on the 3d of March, 1797, he was appointed by the governor to be his own successor on the 22d of April, 1797. The second case was that of Uriah Tracy, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, whose term expired on the 3d of March, 1801, and under an appointment by the governor made on the 4th of March—precisely the case of Mr. Blair—he claimed his seat and was admitted after a very earnest and heated discussion by a party vote of 13 to 10. This precedent was followed the next day by the admission of Mr. Hindman, of Maryland; by the admission of Mr. Condit, of New Jersey, in 1803; Mr. Anderson, of Tennessee, and Mr. Smith, of Maryland, in 1809; Mr. Cutts, of New Hampshire, in 1813; Mr. Williams, of Tennessee, in 1817; all executive appointments to fill places made vacant by the expiration of full terms of service during recesses of the legislature, and all were admitted without discussion and without objection.

"Then in the year 1825 came the case to which the Senator has referred, of James Lanman. Mr. Lanman was appointed by the governor during the recess of the legislature of the State of Connecticut for the beginning of the full term which was to begin on the following 4th of March. The vacancy had not happened when the governor made the appointment, and by an unbroken series of precedents with but one exception it had been held that the governor had no authority to make the appointment under this constitutional clause in anticipation of a vacancy. In the first place it did not come within the letter of the Constitution; and in the next place not only did it not come within the letter of the Constitution, but it was impossible for the governor to know that the legislature would not assemble and fill the place before the constitutional term began. In one of the early cases the governor had made the appointment in anticipation. I think that was not noticed by the Senate; at least no point was made upon it, and the Senator was admitted without objection; but in no other case had that happened.

"In the Lanman case, therefore, there was a clear, unquestionable objection. The debates are not reported. Who knows what the ground was upon which the majority of the Senate proceeded? The National Intelligencer on the next day in a very clear article stated that the Senate had proceeded on the ground which I have stated, that the governor could not exercise his authority until the vacancy actually occurred. Mr. Gordon, of Pennsylvania, in his Digest of the Laws of the United States, who is referred to by Judge Story as a very able and accurate law writer cotemporary with that decision, and whose book was published a few years after, stated that the case went upon the ground that the governor had no right to appoint until the vacancy actually happened. Judge Story in his work on the Constitution of the United States, on the authority of Mr. Gordon's Digest, Judge Story being a cotemporary of the Senators who made the decision, sitting here in court at the time it was made, undoubtedly hearing and knowing something personally of so interesting a historic event, says that it was put by the Senate upon the ground that the governor had no right to appoint in anticipation of a vacancy. And the first suggestion, so far as I know—I do not remember the Niles's Register statement which the Senator read—that anybody put the Lanman case upon any other ground than the clear, indisputable ground which I have stated is in Mr. Grundy's report made twelve years after. Mr. Grundy, in distinguishing the Sevier case, undertakes to make his distinction from the Lanman case by saying that the Lanman case went upon the ground that the governor could not appoint when the vacancy happened at the beginning of a term.

"How weak a proposition—I do not now apply the adjective to my honorable friend's statement, which is a very strong and clear one—but how weak a proposition that is, whoever made it, that a single man should undertake to pronounce the ground upon which forty or fifty Senators proceeded in determining a question of constitutional law, when only one or two of them engaged in the debate. Suppose it to be true that Mr. Tazewell agreed with my honorable friend from Missouri and with the gentleman whose high authority he has cited and so argued, and every other member of the Senate knew perfectly well that whether that was sound or unsound Lanman was not entitled to his seat for the clear and indisputable reason that his appointment had been made by the governor before the vacancy occurred. Does the Senator from Missouri doubt that every one of that majority would have voted against Lanman for the reason that the governor had made the appointment before he had the right to appoint, just as if Mr. Blair had been appointed six months ago by the governor of New Hampshire? That being the case, we are all ageeed that the majority of the Senate would have been constrained to deny the claim of Mr. Lanman. For that reason it seems to me that it is utterly preposterous to say that because one particular Senator made an argument stating another ground also, a majority of the Senate must of course have proceeded on that, and that is a judgment of the Senate of sufficient strength and weight to bear down an uninterrupted series of precedents coming down to the year 1825, and to bear down also the latest and gravest precedent bearing upon the question that happened six years ago.

"Mr. President, this is the general history of this case. It will be found stated at greater length, with all the authorities, all the points as far as I could think of them, in the report made from the Committee on Privileges and Elections by the minority in the Bell case and in the discussion six years ago. If any Senator desires to refresh himself on the question he can look at that report and those debates. But it is, it seems to me, enough, in addition to what I have said, to remark that I cannot conceive it credible that the framers of the Constitution, having for their first and leading object the keeping of the Senate full, the rights of the people and the rights of the States preserved by their full and complete representation, and having given the governor of the State the right to provide for an exigency which would arise at any other period of the term, should have intended to deprive the people of that privilege and the governor of that authority, merely because the vacancy happened at the beginning of the term.

"You have on one side the ten or twelve precedents made by the fathers of the Republic; you have also the decision of the executive department acquiesced in from the foundation of the Government, supported by the authority of John Marshall and William Wirt, in regard to the meaning of precisely similar language in another part of the Constitution; you have the great judgment of the supreme court of Indiana, your own State, Mr. President, made by one of its most accomplished jurists, and you have in addition to that the necessity of preserving the rights of the people of these States; and the one thing opposed is a decision of the Senate, in regard to which no man can know that any single Senator but Mr. Tazewell or possibly Mr. Benton, who wrote about it twenty-five years after, put his decision on this ground, and a decision which the Senate would have been compelled to make on another ground if this ground had never existed; and it is that doubtful, questionable, uncertain precedent upon which the learned Senator and those who think with him rely to bear the weight of this case."

[Remarks of Mr. Pike, of New Hampshire, in support of the resolution submitted by Mr. Hoar that Mr. Blair be admitted to take the oath of office. Found in the proceedings of March 10, 1885, in the Congressional Record, vol. xvii, part 1, p. 23.]

"Mr. President, inasmuch as some criticism has been made upon the legislature of New Hampshire, and it has been stated by some gentlemen that they had not acted in the choice of a Senator when they should have acted, I desire to say a few words.

"We have a legislature once in two years—a biennial legislature. One was chosen in November, 1882, and another was chosen last November, or November, 1884. Now, the question is, which legislature has the right to elect? After our constitution was changed that became a mooted question in our State. We had the national law, to which I will ask the attention of Senators while I read:

"'The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.'

"By this national law of 1866 the legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the term was the legislature to elect. Our legislature supposed that the legislature chosen last November in Mr. Blair's case was the one next preceding the end of his term, which was to expire on the 4th of March. A large majority of them acted upon that idea. But precisely the same question arose six years ago at the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term, and at the time when Mr. Bell was appointed, about whom so much talk has been made.

"That our legislature might put itself in harmony with the National Government, that it might act in obedience to the national law, application was made to the Congress of the United States, and the recent Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Cameron, introduced a bill by which the national law that I have read might be so modified as to meet the condition of things in our State. The question came up here and was considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this very Senate as to whether the legislature elected in the autumn before the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term, or the legislature elected two years before, was the one that should choose the Senator to succeed him; and that bill and that question were considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and Mr. McMillan, a Senator now upon this floor, made the unanimous report of that committee that the legislature elected immediately preceding the expiration of the term, that is, the legislature in Mr. Bell's case, elected the autumn before, and the legislature in the present (Mr. Blair's) case, elected last autumn, was the legislature that had the power, and the only legislature that had the power, to elect.

"That report was submitted to this body, and by a unanimous vote, as the record shows, not a single Senator here dissenting upon adopting the report of that committee, the legislature of New Hampshire elected last autumn was the one and the only one that could elect a Senator for this term. Now, it seems to me that New Hampshire ought not to be very much criticised when she has made this effort to find what the national will was and to find what the will of the Senate was, because she has obeyed it and because she has not disobeyed it; more especially after the question as to whether the governor had the right to fill the vacancy at the end of Mr. Wadleigh's term in 1879 was raised and it was decided that he had the power.

"Mr. President, I hold a seat on this floor. I was elected two years ago last August by the legislature assembling in June, but my term commenced in the March before. Our legislature acted upon the idea that the national law as they understood required, and as the construction given it unanimously by the Senate required, that the legislature to elect, and the only one which could elect, was the one chosen immediately preceding the end of the term.

"In a discussion six years ago in Mr. Bell's case the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Bayard, so recently here and so distinguished when here, submitted his views to the Senate, and upon the question what legislature has the right to elect in New Hampshire, whether it be the one elected in November preceding the end of the term or the one elected two years and a half before, said:

"'By that law'—

"Having quoted immediately before the national law which I have read—

"'By that law was indicated the legislature and the only legislature which should fill vacancies in the Senate of the United States, whether occurring by expiration of the term or from any other cause.'

"That was the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Delaware then, as it had been the unanimous opinion of the Senate only four years before.

"Allusion has been made to the supreme court of our State. As I said, there has been considerable division of sentiment in our State, although our legislature has been very largely in favor of giving the construction to the national law that its plain terms seem to indicate it ought to have, and which the Senate has given to it, and which the seating of Mr. Bell affirmed. The opinion of the court was asked three years ago. My recent colleague and the gentleman who asks a seat here introduced this question into the Senate by a resolution asking the Senate to reconsider and revise its opinion if it was erroneous. There may be found in the Congressional Record, which I have here, the opinion of the court upon this question which he cited. The opinion of our court was read by him, and, as I said, it is printed in the Record with other opinions. But notwithstanding that, the Senate decided that the national law was too plain to be misunderstood; that it was necessary it should be construed as it had been construed, and refused to render any relief.

"Mr. President, I have but little more to say. I am not only asserting the fact, but I have the conviction in my own mind that the clause in our National Constitution which says that 'when vacancies happen from resignation or otherwise,' instead of being words of limitation, ought to be construed to have a very different meaning. This is the only branch of the Government where States have an equality, where one State has just as much power as another. The framers of the Constitution were so much in earnest that that should be the fact that they prohibited any amendment to the Constitution depriving the States of their equality of suffrage in this body. My idea is that when the framers of the Constitution said 'when a vacancy happens by resignation, or otherwise,' they meant when it happens by resignation, or otherwise, from any cause whatever; that they are words of enlargement and explanation, so that there might not be any doubt upon the question that this body should have equal representation, that there should be equal suffrage on this floor, and that if a vacancy occurred from any cause the executive should have the right to fill it.

"Now where do we stand on this question? The Government decided first by the national law, and the Senate has decided upon the McMillan report and upon the admission of Mr. Bell, that the legislature having the right was the one elected immediately preceding the end of the term. Then they have settled in Mr. Bell's case another question, as to filling the vacancy happening at the end of the term and before the meeting of the legislature, that the governor had the right to appoint, under which appointment Mr. Bell was seated; and that is precisely the question before us to-day."

"I wish to say one word, Mr. President, about what is called the act of Congress of 1866. The Constitution provides that Congress may regulate the manner by which and the time at which the legislature of a State shall elect a Senator. That is all the authority which the Constitution of the United States reposes in Congress over that subject. It says in another place, but in the same connection, that the legislature of a State shall ordinarily—I am not now on the question of filling vacancies—elect a Senator for a term of six years. It names nothing but the legislature of a State to do that.

"I was here when the act of 1866 passed, but I had just come into the Senate and I gave it no attention; I probably voted for it if there was a division, it being reported by a committee. But I have been of the opinion ever since I came to examine the subject, and I am of opinion now, as I have stated before, I think, in this body, that the act of Congress, in so far as it undertakes to declare what legislature, whether chosen before or after the expiration of a term, or how long before or how long after, shall elect a Senator, goes beyond its constitutional power. I am also of opinion, and I state it deliberately, and I believe I have stated it before, that when the Congress of the United States undertakes to create a body to elect a Senator which the constitution of the State has not created and which is not its legislature it has gone beyond its power.

"By the constitution, I think, of every State in the Union, certainly every one that I know of, the legislative power is vested in two separate and independent bodies, each one of which acts by itself and for itself, and that is the legislature of the State of which the Constitution of the United States speaks when it says that the legislature shall elect a Senator. Therefore I am of opinion that Congress has no more power to turn the two bodies, the senate and house of representatives of a State, formed under its own constitution as two separate bodies of different numbers and of different constituencies, into one consolidated body voting per capita, than it has to declare that a town meeting in the State of Vermont may elect a Senator and call that a legislature, because it is not by the constitution of the State its legislature. But that is apart from this question, and I should not have referred to it only that the act of Congress has been spoken of.

"Now let us come to the question. First, I will begin with the original Constitution, to which my friend from Missouri has made reference, as he supposes supporting his view of the meaning of the words "resignation or otherwise." In the original draught of the Constitution submitted to the convention, as it appears on page 205 of volume 5 of Elliott's Debates, in the Madison Papers, the third section was:

"'On the death, removal, or resignation of any Senator, his place to be filled out of the district from which he came.'

"That was the first draught. The scheme having been entirely changed and abandoned, later on, at page 377, Mr. Rutledge, on the 6th of August, 1787, reported from the committee of detail as follows:

"'ART. V, SEC. 1.—The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.'

"There, as it stood in that final report in detail, final at that time but changed afterward, you will see that there was no limitation or qualification or restriction except 'vacancies.' They might occur during the sitting of a legislature. Whenever they occurred the executive was to fill those vacancies until the legislature should elect, not until its next meeting even; but in order to keep the representation of the States full, in order to create a national government which should have all its faculties and all its members in place to perform their duties, this draught reported by the committee of detail provided for a universal filling of a vacancy by the executive, and provided for his filling it if a vacancy happened or occurred or existed, whatever it was, even if the legislature were sitting.

"Now we come to the amendment of Mr. Madison. That draught was under consideration on the 9th of August. Article V, section 1, the one I have read, was taken up, and I shall read the whole proceeding in connection, without any observation, so that it will appear just as it stands in these debates:

"'Mr. Wilson objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the legislatures will meet so frequently. It removes the appointment too far from the people, the executives in most of the States being elected by the legislatures. As he had always thought the appointment of the executive by the legislative department wrong, so it was still more so that the executive should elect into the legislative department.

"'Mr. Randolph thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate. In some States the legislatures meet but once a year. As the Senate will have more power and consist of a smaller number than the other house, vacancies there will be of more consequence. The executives might be safely trusted, he thought, with the appointment for so short a time.

"'Mr. ELLSWORTH. It is only said that the executive may supply vacancies. When the legislative meeting happens to be near the power will not be exerted. As there will be but two members from a State, vacancies may be of great moment.

"'Mr. WILLIAMSON. Senators may resign or not accept. This provision is therefore absolutely necessary.

"'On the question of striking out "vacancies shall be supplied by the executives"—

"'Pennsylvania, ay, 1; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, no, 8; Maryland, divided.

"'Mr. Williamson moved to insert, after "vacancies shall be supplied by the executives," the words, "unless other provision shall be made by the legislature" (of the State).

"'Mr. ELLSWORTH. He was willing to trust the legislature, or the executive, of a State, but not to give the former a discretion to refer appointments for the Senate to whom they pleased.

"'On the question on Mr. Williamson's motion, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, ay, 4; New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, no, 6.

"'Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies" and insert the words "happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature."

"'Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. This is absolutely necessary; otherwise, as members chosen into the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it will be in the power of a legislature, by appointing a man a Senator against his consent, to deprive the United States of his services.

"'The motion of Mr. Madison was agreed to, nem con.'

"Thus you will see, Mr. President, that the motive for inserting the words 'resignation or otherwise' (which was afterward trimmed down by leaving out on the report of the committee on style the words 'refusal to accept;' so as to leave it only 'resignation or otherwise') was distinctly stated by Mr. Madison to be, not that you were to classify a kind of vacancies by resignation, but they were put in expressly for the purpose of recognizing the power of a Senator to refuse to hold on to the office to which he had been appointed.

* * * * * * *

"There never was any question in the debates in the constitutional convention but what it was of the highest importance, the very purpose of the Constitution which provided two Senators from each State, that each State should have all the time, whenever this body met, its full representation, not only for the general benefit of all the people, but sometimes, as was then thought, for its own security, for the preservation of its own rights.

"I think, therefore, that this language of Mr. Madison and the action of the convention clearly show that the argument of my friend from Missouri is a mistaken one in supposing that the introduction of the word 'resignation' was for the purpose of giving a class, one of a kind of events that might happen, on the occasion of which the executive might act and not otherwise; because Mr. Madison states the purpose to be exactly the other thing, by putting in one of the words of that kind and then putting in the word 'otherwise,' to make it clear that a Senator had a right to resign his place, and then, in order to carry on the whole operations of the Government according to the Constitution, providing that the executive, if the legislature were not sitting, should fill it until the legislature met.

"There was nothing otherwise in the whole discussion, I repeat, from beginning to end; and as the draught originally stood it went to the extent, as every Senator will see, of authorizing the executive to fill a vacancy which happened when the legislature itself was sitting until it did fill it; and the only motive stated for the change, which they all agreed to unanimously, was to put in some one word that would affirm and recognize the right of a Senator to resign his place, and then to provide that the State should not go without being represented.

"Now let us come to the Constitution just for a moment, and I shall have done. The legislature shall elect for the term of six years. That is the power given to the legislature.

"'The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years.'

"If you stop there and give it a literal construction, not looking to the purposes of the Constitution—to have a full Senate—there would be no power in any State legislature in this Union to elect if they allowed the time to go by so that when they elected they could not elect under the Constitution for a term of six years. They must elect for a shorter term; they must in New Hampshire; they must in the hundred cases almost which have happened, when the legislature has failed to make provision in advance, so that the election was for six years. Nobody maintains any such proposition, because it defeats the object the Constitution had in view, which was that each State should have two Senators. Now we come to this language about the executive, and see where we are upon the construction of my friend from Missouri:

"'And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill'—

"What?—

"'such vacancies.'

"The very ones that are named in the preceding line. Therefore, if the authority of an executive is only to fill a vacancy which occurs by resignation or death or expulsion—the only three ways that I can think of, because a refusal to accept does not create a vacancy, it leaves the old vacancy just where it was—if that is the meaning, then the only authority which is left to the legislature is to fill the very vacancy that the governor had a right to fill temporarily, and no other. So if the governor of New Hampshire at this moment has not the power to fill this vacancy, by the very same sign and on the very same words the legislature of New Hampshire when it meets next June cannot fill it even, for the Constitution says in language as plain as words can make it that the vacancy which the legislature is to fill is 'such' vacancy, that is, a vacancy which occurs by resignation or otherwise, that the executive of the State may fill if it happens during the recess of the legislature. We cannot stand on that construction; nobody pretends that we can.

"By what authority of logic or law is it, then, that we hold that the very same words three lines before limit the power of the executive to a particular class of cases, and that the very same words three lines afterward expand the power of the legislature to every kind of vacancy that may exist? 'That won't do,' to use a phrase of a late eminent Senator of this body. We cannot stand on it.

"We hear much of the word 'otherwise.' If Mr. Madison by proposing, or the convention by adopting, the words 'resignation or otherwise' had meant to classify a series of cases like resignation, why would not Mr. Madison, eminent in his knowledge of the English language and clear in its expression, have said 'likewise'? That is the adverb which would suit the class of cases to which my friend from Missouri refers. 'Other things happening in like manner' is the definition of 'likewise,' while 'otherwise' means things happening in any other manner than by resignation. That is the dictionary and the common sense and the universal knowledge of everybody who knows the English language.

"What was the object of the Constitution? It was that the representation of each State should be full, and the Constitution provided two means of keeping it full. First, by the legislature for the full term electing in advance before any vacancy occurred. That would provide for all that. Then both the executive and the legislature, after a vacancy did happen at a time when the legislature was not in session, could fill it then and there, by providing that instantly the governor in the first instance and the legislature at its next meeting should fill up that vacancy so as to carry out the great objects of the Constitution.

"Wherefore, then, upon any principle of patriotism, or law, or justice, should we endeavor by construction to narrow down the franchise of a State, if I may call it that, and endeavor to find some class of cases where for some period of time a State shall go unrepresented? I am unable to see it; and this report of the debates in the convention shows clearly to my mind, and I think even to that of my friend from Missouri and my friend from Delaware, that the word 'resignation' was not put in with the object that my friends think it was, but for an entirely different object, as was stated by Mr. Madison himself.

"This question was fairly debated when the gentlemen on the other side were in a majority in this Chamber. Without a party division, gentlemen on both sides, voting according to the light they had and not dividing upon party lines, settled this identical question. The Senate in sitting upon such a question sits as judges. The Constitution says so. We are not defining policies; we are not setting up expediencies; we are not carrying on party warfare: we are sitting as the solemn judges sworn to try and determine the election and qualification of a gentleman who presents himself to be a member of this body. We have come to a decision, just as the Supreme Court of the United States sitting two hundred feet from us comes to a decision in a great variety of cases where the judges differ—five one way four another or whatever it may be, a difference of opinion. The decision of the court is announced. What would become of that court if the next time a similar question came up the whole thing was opened again and the contest was gone over repeatedly from year to year and time to time in order to see which should get in the ascendency upon all questions? Nothing would be settled, and the court would be destroyed, and justice, too, for that matter.

"How is it different here? When we have come to a decision, even in a case of doubt, having come to it fairly, not in a time of party heat, or by a party vote, when we, after full deliberation, have come to a decision which carries out confessedly the objects of the Constitution to keep the representation of a State full, should we not stick to it; or are we, every time a similar question comes up about elections, to reverse our decisions, retry them, hold them of no force, and thus keep this body continually in a turmoil over questions of representations in it that come from the States? However doubtful it might have been—it did not seem to me so, to be sure, but however doubtful it might appear to the minds of gentlemen who voted in the minority—it appears to me that, once decided and decided in favor of representation, it would be better to follow that as an established precedent which carries out the objects the Constitution has in view."

[Fifty-second Congress—First Session.]

of Texas.

Mr. Reagan, elected Senator from the State of Texas for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1887, resigned his office, the resignation to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891. The executive of the State of Texas, after the receipt of the resignation of Mr. Reagan, appointed Mr. Chilton to fill the vacancy occasioned by said resignation, the appointment to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891. The certificate bears date April 25, 1891. December 7, 1891, Mr. Chilton appeared and took his seat and on the same day his credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That committee reported January 25, 1892, that—

"So far as the precedents are concerned, it appears that in three cases persons so appointed have been admitted to their seats without question; that Mr. Tracy was admitted and Mr. Lanman rejected, where the executive made the appointment in anticipation of a vacancy, there being a discussion in the Senate, but no satisfactory evidence of the grounds of the judgment; that in one case, that of Mr. Sevier, a person so appointed has been admitted, when the validity of the appointment was questioned, upon other grounds, without raising this question specifically; and that in modern times the practice has been uniform for the State executive to delay appointment until the actual happening of the vacancy. * * * that where the power is given to fill vacancies in public offices it has been the uniform practice to permit resignations of such offices to be made, to take effect at a future day, and to hold that the appointing power is entitled to make the appointment in advance to fill the vacancy, to take effect when the resignation becomes operative, unless the language of the constitutional or statute provision under which the authority is exercised forbids such construction;" that the same rule should be applied to the case of resignations and vacancies in the Senate, and that, therefore, Mr. Chilton was entitled to retain his seat.

January 27, 1892, the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the journal of the Senate relating to it, with the report of the committee. (Sen. Rep. No. 105, 1st Sess. 52d Cong.)

MONDAY, December 7, 1891.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of Horace Chilton, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Texas to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John H. Reagan in the term expiring March 3, 1893; which were read and placed on file.

On the same day Mr. Chilton appeared. The oath prescribed by law was administered to him, and he took his seat.

On motion by Mr. Hoar,

Ordered, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the circumstances and validity of the appointment of Horace Chilton as a Senator from the State of Texas.

[The debate on this order may be found Cong. Record, 1st sess. 52d Cong., p. 3, daily edition.]

MONDAY, January 25, 1892.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections who were instructed to inquire into the validity and circumstances of the appointment of Horace Chilton as a Senator from the State of Texas, submitted a report (No. 105) accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. Horace Chilton, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas, on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. John H. Reagan, which had previously been made to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Teller (chairman), Hoar, Mitchell, Chandler, Higgins, Vance, Pugh, Gray, Turpie.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 25, 1892.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were directed by resolution of December 12, 1891, to inquire into and report upon the circumstances and validity of the appointment of Mr. Chilton to a seat in the Senate from the State of Texas, have complied with said resolution and respectfully report:

Mr. Reagan, elected Senator from the State of Texas for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1887, resigned his office, the resignation to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891. The executive of the State of Texas, on the 25th day of April, 1891, and after the receipt of the resignation of Mr. Reagan, appointed Mr. Chilton to fill the vacancy occasioned by said resignation. Mr. Chilton's credentials set forth the resignation of Mr. Reagan, and further declare—

"Now, therefore, I, J. S. Hogg, governor of the State of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Texas, do hereby appoint Horace Chilton, of Smith County, Texas, Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Texas, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. John S. Reagan. This appointment to take effect the 10th day of June, A. D. 1891."

The certificate bears date April 25, 1891.

Mr. Chilton is in all other respects duly qualified to be a Senator from the State of Texas. The only question is whether the governor might lawfully make this appointment before the resignation of Mr. Reagan actually took effect.

The provision of the Constitution affecting the question is as follows:

"ART. I, Sec. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years, * * * and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

A similar state of facts has arisen in a number of instances since the Constitution went into operation.

The term of Uriah Tracy, Senator from Connecticut, expired March 3, 1801; he was appointed by the governor of Connecticut February 20, 1801, "from the 3d of March next until the next meeting of the legislature of said State," the legislature of the State not being in session at the time of said appointment or thereafter until after said 4th of March. Exception being taken to his credentials, he was admitted to the seat by a vote of 13 yeas to 10 nays, and held the seat during the special session of the Senate, March 4 and 5.

Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, was appointed by the executive February 6, 1809, to fill the vacancy which would result from the expiration of his term, March 3, 1809. He held the seat under these credentials during the special session of the Senate, March 4 to March 7, 1809.

John Williams, of Tennessee, was appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy which would result from the expiration of his own term, March 3, 1817. Under these credentials he held his seat from March 4 to 6, 1817.

John McPherson Berrien, of Georgia, resigned by letter dated Washington, May 28, 1852, addressed to the President pro tempore, and read in Senate same date. (Globe, first session Thirty-second Congress, p. 1493.)

Robert M Charlton, his successor, appeared June 11, 1852, with credentials signed by the governor of Georgia, and dated May 18, 1852, to take effect from and after May 31, 1852. He was sworn and took his seat without objection. (Senate Journal, first session. Thirty-second Congress, p. 468.)

March 4, 1825, James Lanman, of Connecticut, presented credentials showing an appointment made February 8, 1825, by the governor of the State to fill the vacancy about to result from the expiration of his term, March 3, 1825. Objection being made, Mr. Lanman was refused a seat a a vote of 23 to 13. There is no historical evidence from which we can determine on what ground the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman, whether it was on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a term, or on the ground that the governor could not lawfully make the appointment in anticipation and before a vacancy occurred, and before he could possibly know whether the legislature might not be called together before that time. Judge Story (Const., sec. 727, n. 2) says:

"In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, a question occurred whether the State executive could make an appointment in the recess of the State legislature in anticipation of the expiration of the term of office of an existing Senator. It was decided by the Senate that he could not make such an appointment. The facts were that Mr. Lanman's term as Senator expired on the 3d of March, 1825. The President had convoked the Senate to meet on the 4th of March. The governor of Connecticut, in the recess of the legislature (whose session would be in May), on the 9th of the preceding February appointed Mr. Lanman as Senator, to sit in the Senate after the 3d of March. The Senate by a vote of 23 to 18 decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred."

The following statement appears in the National Intelligencer of Tuesday, March 8, 1825:

"An important constitutional question was yesterday decided in the Senate by the refusal to admit Mr. Lanman to a seat in the Senate under a commission from the governor, granted before the expiration of Mr. Lanman's late term of service. This is the first time this question has been adjudicated under such circumstances as to form a precedent; and we presume it may now be considered a settled construction of the constitutional provision that a vacancy must have literally 'happened' or come to pass before an appointment can be made to fill it. The case has once been questioned and decided differently, but it was in strong party times, all the Federal members voting for the member's taking his seat and all the Democratic members against it, under which circumstances the decision has not been much respected as a precedent. So far as it was a precedent it is now reversed."

Gorden's Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1827, appendix, note 1 B, states the ground of the decision in the same way, but manifestly bases the statement on the authority of the National Intelligencer.

On the other hand, Mr. Grundy, in his report from the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of Mr. Sevier, Senator from the State of Arkansas, who was appointed by the governor of Arkansas January 17, 1837, to fill the vacancy which would occur on the 3d of March following, by the expiration of Mr. Sevier's previous term, declared that the decision in the Lanman case was on the ground "that the legislature must provide for all vacancies, which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution." He distinguished Mr. Sevier's case from the Lanman case by the fact that the time that Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot, he having been one of the Senators appointed by the State on its admission.

Niles's Register of Friday, March 12, states the question in regard to the Lanman case:

"The question was whether the failure by the legislature to make a choice of Senator constitutes the contingency in which the governor may appoint a Senator."

Mr. Benton, in his Thirty Years' View, states that the principal argument against the admission of Mr. Lanman was made by Mr. Tazewell, that argument being that the word "happen" in the Constitution could not apply to a foreseen event, bound to occur at a fixed period, and that therefore it was the right of the legislature only to fill a vacancy which was foreseen, regular, and certain, and that there was no right in the governor to supply that omission.

Mr. Lanman was not admitted to the seat. There is nothing in the contemporary record of the debates or in the resolution which enables us to determine whether the majority of the Senate based its action on the ground stated by Mr. Benton to have been maintained by Mr. Tazewell, or on the ground stated by Judge Story and by the National Intelligencer. The case, therefore, is not an authority on either side of the question. So that it is impossible to determine whether the Senate meant to overrule the Tracy case on one ground or the other.

On the other hand, an examination of the very numerous cases where the executives of States have made appointments when the legislature was not in session shows that in a great many of them the executive has postponed action, where the resignations were made to take effect at a future time or where the previous term had expired by its own limitation, until after the vacancy existed. In all probability this postponement was caused by a belief on the part of the executive that he had no authority to provide for filling a vacancy until it actually occurred, or at any rate, that the question was so far in doubt that it would be unsafe to make the appointment in anticipation.

So far, then, as the precedents are concerned, it appears that in three cases persons so appointed have been admitted to their seats without question; that Mr. Tracy was admitted and Mr. Lanman rejected, where the executive made the appointment in anticipation of a vacancy, there being a discussion in the Senate, but no satisfactory evidence of the grounds of the judgment; that in one case, that of Mr. Sevier, a person so appointed has been admitted, when the validity of the appointment was questioned, upon other grounds, without raising this question specifically; and that in modern times, the practice has been uniform for the State executive to delay appointment until the actual happening of the vacancy.

Under these circumstances, it seems to us that the Senate may now determine the question, unhampered by any precedents of its own.

We suppose that where the power is given to fill vacancies in public offices, it has been the uniform practice to permit resignations of such offices to be made, to take effect at a future day, and to hold that the appointing power is entitled to make the appointment in advance to fill the vacancy, to take effect when the resignation becomes operative, unless the language of the constitutional or statute provision under which the authority is exercised forbids such construction.

The Constitution of the United States, Article II, section 2, in providing for the appointing power, enacts:

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

We believe it has been the uniform practice of the Executive from the beginning to accept resignations which are to take effect in the future, and to make appointments, also to take effect in the future, to fill them. We suppose that a like practice also prevails in regard to the heads of Departments in the exercise of the appointing power conferred by law upon them. The language of the provision of the Constitution under consideration, that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature," seems to us to admit easily of a like construction. We do not suppose that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to establish different rules for these two cases.

The Senate has recently, after full consideration, determined that the constitutional provision that the Senate shall choose a president pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President permits the choice of an officer in advance of the actual occurrence of the contingency referred to, who may take the chair whenever the Vice-President may be absent, until the Senate otherwise order. In all these cases, including that which we are now considering, the important consideration is that it must have been the purpose of the framers of the Constitution, as it is clearly for the public interest, that the office as far as possible should always be filled. This consideration applies with peculiar force to the office of Senator. We should be very unwilling to establish a construction of the Constitution which would make it certain that in no case of the resignation of a Senator, however necessary that resignation might be, there should be a succession without a considerable interval.

This would bear with peculiar hardship upon States remote from the seat of government, and might determine the policy of the country in great emergencies and in matters peculiarly affecting particular States, when such States were but partially represented, or possibly not represented at all. The tendency of the opinion of the Senate, as evidenced by its more recent decisions, has been more and more to lean to a construction which, as far as possible, secures that the seats in the Senate should be filled without any interruption in the representation of the State. Thus, in the case of Mr. Bell and Mr. Blair, Senators from the State of New Hampshire, it has been held that the executive might fill the vacancy occurring at the beginning of the constitutional term in consequence of the failure or the inability of the legislature to elect a Senator for that term, in compliance with the statute of 1866 (Revised Statutes, sections 14 and 19), in spite of very weighty and influential opinions to the contrary.

So it has been held and is now the settled construction, that if a vacancy occur during the recess of the Senate, and a person be regularly nominated to the Senate at its next session to fill it, and be rejected, and the Senate adjourn without the office being filled, the President is entitled to make a new appointment in the next vacation. So, if the officer died during the session, and his death be not known until after the adjournment, as is said by the Attorney-General Taney, in his able report (Opinions of Attorneys-General, Vol. 2, p. 523):

"It is admitted by everyone that the President may appoint in such cases, and the practice of the Government has continually conformed to that construction."

"It was the intention of the Constitution," Mr. Taney further says, "that the offices created by law and necessary to carry out the operations of the Government should always be full, or, at all events, that the vacancy should not be a protracted one." (See also, to the same effect, the opinion of William Wirt, 1 Op. Att'ys-Gen., 631.)

It has been suggested that if this construction be established it will be in the power of the governor of the State to provide by appointment for the filling of future vacancies long before they occur, and, therefore, the will of the people of the State, as it exists at or near the time of filling the vacancy, fail of being carried into effect. But the instances must necessarily be very rare indeed where the vacancy can be anticipated beforehand under circumstances which will create such temptation to the executive. Against that, as against many other evils which are possible under a popular government, as under other governments, the protection in general must be in the character and integrity of the persons clothed with high public office.

We, therefore, are of the opinion that Mr. Chilton was lawfully appointed by the executive of the State of Texas to the seat which he now holds, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. Horace Chilton, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the sesignation of the Hon. John H. Reagan, which had previously been made, to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1892.

On motion by Mr. Hoar,

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the circumstances and validity of the appointment of Mr. Horace Chilton as a Senator from the State of Texas; and

The resolution reported by the committee was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. Horace Chilton, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas, on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the Resignation of the Hon. John H. Reagan, which had previously been made to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

[Special session of the Senate, March 4, 1893, and first session Fifty-third Congress.]

LEE MANTLE, of Montana.

The term of Wilbur S. Sanders, a Senator from the State of Montana, expired March 3, 1893. The legislature of said State, which was elected next preceding the expiration of the term of Mr. Sanders, adjourned March 3, 1893, after a full session, without electing a Senator. On the 4th day of March, 1893, John E. Richards, the governor of Montana, appointed Lee Mantle to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of Mr. Sanders. On the 9th day of March, 1893, the Senate of the United States having been convened in special session, the credentials of Mr. Mantle were presented and ordered to lie on the table, and were afterwards referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. March 27, 1893, the committee submitted a report, which was chiefly devoted to a discussion of the question of the right of the executive of a State to appoint a Senator to represent the State in the Congress of the United States at the expiration of the term of a Senator in case the legislature having authority to choose a successor to the Senator whose term so expires fails to do so. The conclusion of the committee was in favor of the right of the executive of the State to appoint under such circumstances. The report was accompanied by a resolution declaring Mr. Mantle entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Montana.

From the views expressed in this report a minority of the committee dissented, affirming the view that where the legislature of a State has had an opportunity to elect a Senator and has failed to do so, it is not thereafter competent for the executive of the State to appoint a person to the United States Senate to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of a Senator. The views of the minority were also accompanied by a resolution that Mr. Mantle was not entitled to take his seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Montana.

The question raised by the report of the committee and the resolutions thus submitted was debated in the Senate at considerable length, and on the 28th day of August, 1893, it was decided by a vote of 32 to 29 that Mr. Mantle was not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings in the Senate in relation thereto as published in the Congressional Record, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the views of the minority of the committee, a statement of the days on which the debate occurred with a reference to the record of the same, a portion of the remarks of Senators in such debate, the vote on the substitute for the resolution submitted by the committee, the record of the proceedings on the motion to reconsider such vote, and the proceedings on the final adoption of the substitute for the resolution submitted by the committee.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1893.

Mr. Teller presented the credentials of Hon. Lee Mantle, who had been appointed a Senator from the State of Montana by the governor of that State. He asked that the credentials be read and lie on the table until the Committee on Privileges and Elections should be formed, and then be referred to that committee. The credentials were read as follows:

"Whereas a vacancy hath happened in the office of Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Montana by the expiration of the official term of Wilbur S. Saunders, which said vacancy happened at noon on the 4th day of March, 1893, which said date was during a recess of the legislature of said State, which said recess still continues and said vacancy still exists; and

"Whereas by section 3 of the Constitution of the United States it is provided as to Senators in the Congress of the United States 'if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature,' and the exigency therein contemplated hath occurred.

"Now, therefore, I, John E. Richards, governor of the State of Montana, by virtue of the power in me vested, have appointed and do hereby appoint Lee Mantle to be a Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Montana to fill such vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature of the State of Montana.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State of Montana to be hereto affixed, at Helena, in said State, at 12.30 o'clock on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1893, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and seventeenth.

"[SEAL.] "J. E. RICHARDS, Governor.

"By the governor:

"L. ROTWITT, Secretary of State."

After a brief discussion the credentials were ordered to lie on the table

MONDAY, March 27, 1893.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Lee Mantle, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana, submitted a report with a resolution accompanying the same, which resolution he asked to have read. The resolution was read as follows:

"Resolved, That Lee Mantle is entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Montana."

At the request of Mr. Vance and Mr. Hoar the report, with the accompanying resolution, was ordered to lie on the table to be printed with the views of the minority, when submitted. (Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pp. 32 and 33.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Vance (chairman), Gray, Pugh, Turpie, Palmer, Hoar, Mitchell of Oregon, Chandler, and Higgins.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 27, 1893.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report to accompany Senate resolution relative to admitting Lee Mantle, of Montana, to a seat as a Senator:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Lee Mantle, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana, respectfully report:

The term of Mr. Sanders, Senator from Montana, ended March 3, 1893. The legislature of said State, who were, under Revised Statutes, sections 14, 15, entitled to elect his successor, had adjourned without an election. Thereupon the governor of Montana, on the 4th day of March, 1893, appointed Mr. Mantle to hold the office of Senator until the next meeting of the legislature.

We think said appointment valid.

The provisions of the Constitution under which the question arises are as follows (Art. I, sec. 3):

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall have assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

In the construction of every contract the leading purpose which it was intended to accomplish is to be kept constantly in mind. This purpose is to be appealed to to supply all omissions, to reconcile all inconsistencies, to give a meaning to all ambiguities, and even, in clear cases, to compel a construction opposed sometimes to a clear meaning of particular words and phrases. Human language is imperfect and human intellects differ in respect to the meaning which they attach to language of ordinary clearness. Without this principle of construction it would be impossible for men to deal with each other with any security or to be held justly and reasonably to any obligation whatever.

This principle is of tenfold more importance in a construction of a constitution of government. Without it the grossest injustice and oppression must be wrought under the fundamental law of the State, to be followed inevitably in their turn by revolution, disorder, and anarchy. "Never forget," said Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, "that it is a constitution we are construing." What is the great and leading purpose which the provision now under consideration was designed to accomplish? It is that the Senate of the United States shall be full, always full. Each State was to be represented there by two Senators. No State was ever to be deprived of its equal vote in the Senate except by its own consent to a change in the Constitution itself. This consideration was held to be of infinitely more importance than the question whether the appointment should be made by the legislature or by the executive. Indeed, the latter plan had many advocates in the convention itself.

The executive is supposed to be the foremost citizen of the State. He at that time made all appointments of the States' officers, both judicial and administrative, except a few which the people reserved to themselves, and a still smaller number which were committed to the legislatures. It can not be doubted that if the question had been submitted to the men who framed the Constitution or to the people who adopted it of a choice between a vacancy in the Senate and an appointment for limited periods by the executive, the answer in favor of the latter arrangement would have been unanimous.

The equality of the State representation in the Senate, which can only be secured by keeping both seats full, is of first importance. But the presence of two Senators instead of one is a consideration of very great importance indeed. There are few members of that body whose party feeling would carry them so far as to induce them to prefer the absence of a colleague to the presence of one of opposite political faith. There are a thousand occasions when the power of consulting with an associate devoted to the interests of the same community and conversant with its wishes is of inestimable importance. The author of the Christian religion, when he sent forth his apostles to convert mankind, sent them two and two.

The possibility of vacancies by refusal or resignation of the office of Senator, as well as by the ordinary contingencies of human life, seemed much more important to our fathers than is does to us. There was not such eager desire for public office in their generation as is now unhappily prevalent. If you look over the list of early Senators you will be surprised at the number of resignations. If you read the biography of the men of that day, you will be surprised at the number of men to whom the opportunity of serving in this body was open who refused it. Massachusetts before the Revolution made provision by law for imposing a fine upon persons who declined to serve in the legislature.

Mr. Webster, in his great debate with Mr. Calhoun, considered very seriously and at some length the possibility that the States might refuse to continue their representation here. He appealed to the sense of duty of the members of the State governments and to the obligations resting upon their consciences from their oaths to support the Constitution of the United States. He says:

"The Constitution utters its behests in the name and by authority of the people, and it does not exact from States any plighted public faith to maintain it. On the contrary, it makes its own preservation depend on individual duty and individual obligation. Sir, the States can not omit to appoint Senators and electors. It is not a matter resting in State discretion or State pleasure. The Constitution has taken better care of its own preservation. It lays its hand on individual conscience and individual duty. It incapacitates any man to sit in the legislature of a State who shall not have first taken his solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States as they are to support their own State constitution. Nay, sir, they are as solemnly sworn to support it as we ourselves are, who are members of Congress.

"No member of a State legislature can refuse to proceed, at the proper time, to elect Senators to Congress, or to provide for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President any more than the members of this Senate can refuse, when the appointed day arrives, to meet the members of the other House to count the votes for those officers and ascertain who are chosen. In both cases the duty binds, and with equal strength, the conscience of the individual member, and it is imposed on all by an oath in the same words. Let it then never be said, sir, that it is a matter of discretion with the States whether they will continue the Government or break it up by refusing to appoint Senators and to elect electors. They have no discretion in the matter. The members of their legislatures can not avoid doing either, so often as the time arrives, without a direct violation of their duty and their oaths; such a violation as would break up any other government."

We therefore begin our inquiry with the primal and controlling mandate of the Constitution resting upon us, that this body should be kept full, and that the separate representation therein of each State is the most important and unchangeable single obligation which the instrument creates.

It is said that it can not have been the purpose of the Constitution that the seats in the Senate are to be kept full regardless of the authority by whom the appointment is to be made; and this is undoubtedly true. The Senators appointed to represent the sovereignty of a State were of course to be appointed by some authority that should itself duly and adequately represent that sovereignty. The executive power of the State clearly is such an authority. The executive of the State was, when the Constitution was framed, intrusted with the appointment of many important State officers, judicial and executive.

As has been said, many persons favored the plan of conferring the appointment of Senators wholly upon the State executives, who in those days, almost without exception, appointed the judicial and military officers of the State. It can not be doubted, as we have already said, that if the alternative had been directly submitted to the framers of the Constitution, of the continuance of a vacancy or that it should be filled by appointment by the State executive whenever and however it happened, they would, without hesitation, have preferred the latter. There can be no considerable reason given for supposing if a vacancy happen at the end of a term by death, resignation, or otherwise, that they desired it to be filled by the executive, the legislature not being in session, and that the same desire would not apply with equal force to a vacancy happening at the beginning of a term, the legislature not being in session, and having for any reason failed to make an appointment.

It is said that a failure by the legislature to elect a Senator is a refusal by the State to be represented. The answer to that is twofold:

First. That the Constitution of the United States did not mean to permit a State to refuse to be represented, and this constitutional purpose has been carried out as far as possible by the statute of 1866.

Second. The inability of the majority of a State legislature, where there is more than one candidate, to agree upon a Senator is by no means equivalent to a refusal of a State to elect one. The election, until the recent statute of 1866, was ordinarily made by two separate bodies, each counting one and each requiring a majority for its action. The majority in one branch might consider the election of a particular person or some one entertaining like political views most essential to the public welfare, while a majority in the other branch might as conscientiously hold to the belief that the election of such a person or one of like opinions would be a great public disaster. Both bodies might be equally eager to elect, but in the case supposed an agreement becomes a moral impossibility. The same condition of things may frequently take place, and has frequently taken place since the method of electing by joint ballot was established in States where there are more than two political parties, every one of them zealously holding to its own political opinions. The only solution of this difficulty is the power to appoint by the executive.

We set out, then, in the argument with the clear, unquestionable purpose of the Constitution to keep the Senate full, and the fact that every other purpose of the Constitution relating to such matters is accomplished by holding that the power in question resides in the governor.

It is next to be observed that the language of the Constitution is quite as well suited to confer the power upon the governor of appointing to a vacancy occurring at the beginning of a term, or to a vacancy which began to exist when a legislature was actually in session and continued after the adjournment of the legislature, as any language likely to be used. The language of the Constitution is: "If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." Now an ordinary and well-established meaning of the word "happen" is "take place," "occur," "come to pass." It is frequently applied, according to the best usage, to things into which the element of accident or uncertainty does not in the least enter. The definition of the Century Dictionary, edited by one of our most accomplished philologists, Professor Whitney, is as follows: "To occur by chance; occur unexpectedly or unaccountably; in general, to occur; take place." The definition of the Imperial Dictionary is as follows: "To chance; to be or to be brought about unexpectedly or by chance; to take place; to occur; as, I happened to be there; this happens often."

"There shall no evil happen to the just." Proverbs xii, 31.

Johnson's: "To fall out; to chance; to come to pass." "Bring forth your strong reasons * * * and shew us what shall happen." Isaiah xli, 21, 22.

"Say not I have sinned, and what harm hath happened unto me?" Eccles. v, 4.

Starmouth: "To come by chance; to fall out; to befall; to light upon; to occur."

Webster: 1. "To come by chance; to come without previous expectation; to fall out." 2. "To take place; to occur." "They talked together of these things which had happened." Luke xxiv, 14.

Worcester: 1. "To fall out; to chance; to come to pass; to take place; to befall; to betide; to occur." "Shew us what shall happen." Isaiah xli, 22.

There are plenty of familiar instances of this use of the word "happen"—if the Fourth of July happen on Sunday, if it happen to be high tide—so that, as it seems to us, the words of the Constitution convey to an ordinary apprehension the simple meaning if there be a vacancy, by resignation or otherwise, the executive may make temporary appointments, etc.

It is noticeable that the word "vacancies" is in the plural. "The seats shall be vacated," etc. "If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive may make temporary appointments"—not a single appointment—"until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." The language of the Constitution, it seems to us, was carefully designed to apply to the case, not of a single vacancy, which might occur only in a single recess of the legislature, but to every case where a legislature having adjourned without action a second or third vacancy should occur which, under the language of the Constitution, may be provided for by temporary appointments.

Is it not the very subtlety of refinement, when the Constitution declares that seats shall be "vacated" in two, four, and six years and that vacancies shall be filled by executive appointment until the legislature meets, to hold that the words "vacate" and "vacancies" have a totally different meaning?

We have, then, a constitutional purpose which can only be completely effected by the construction which we contend should be given. We have also language in the Constitution adapted, without any forced or strained construction, to effect or accomplish that purpose.

We find next that where the same language is used in other places in the Constitution the settled construction is that upon which we now insist. Section 2, in providing for the House of Representatives, declares that: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Is there any question, when under the old rule it required elections by the people to be by majorities, and there was a failure to choose a Representative by reason that there were three candidates, neither of which had a majority over the other two, that it was the duty and prerogative of the executive authority of the State, under this clause of the Constitution, to issue a writ of election to fill the vacancy?

Article 2, section 2, of the Constitution, in providing for the appointment of executive officers, declares: "The President shall have the power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

It is well settled, in accordance with the opinion of Attorneys-General Wirt, Taney, Legare, Mason, Cushing, Bates, Stanberry, Evarts, and Devens, that where an office becomes vacant during the session of the Senate, and the Senate adjourns before it has been filled, that a vacancy happens during the recess of the Senate, within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution; and that the President's power to fill the vacancy comes into life.

Upon this construction of the Constitution the late Mr. Justice David Davis received a commission and sat upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States by virtue thereof.

Mr. Attorney-General Taney, in his opinion, cites the opinion of President John Quincy Adams to the same effect as his own. Indeed, all the opinions of the Attorneys-General before referred to were acted upon by the Presidents of the United States to whose administration they belonged, constituting together a vast weight of constitutional authority. All these opinions are cited in a very able discussion of this question by Attorney-General Devens. (Opins. Attys. Gen., vol. 16, p. 522.)

In the case of the State ex rel. Yancey v. Hyde (121 Ind., 20), the act of the general assembly of Indiana having created an office to be filled by a director elected by the legislature, it was held, Berkshire, J., giving the opinion, that so much of the act as provided for the appointment of the officer by the legislature was unconstitutional and void, the appointment to office not being a legislative function—the Constitution vesting the appointing power in the executive.

Second. That the appointment of such officer by the legislature being void, there was a vacancy in the office at the beginning of the term, which the governor was competent to fill, under the powers given him by the Constitution to fill vacancies in public offices.

The following is the provision of the constitution of Indiana above referred to, section 18, Article V:

"When, during the recess of the general assembly, a vacancy shall happen in any office the appointment to which is vested in the general assembly or when at any time a vacancy shall have occurred in any other State office or in the office of judge of any court, the governor shall fill such vacancy by appointment."

It will be seen that that case deals with precisely the same question which arises here.

In the case of the State v. Gorby (122 Ind., 17), it was held as follows:

"Where an office is created by law, to be filled immediately, no legitimate mode being provided for filling the same, it is vacant on the taking effect of the law, and the governor may fill such vacancy by appointment. So, the legislature having created the office of director of the department of geology, an administrative State office, but having no power to fill it, the office was vacant and the governor had the right to fill the vacancy until a general election by the people."

We have, then, first, a clear and controlling constitutional purpose that every State shall be at all times represented in the Senate by two Senators.

Second. A declaration by the Constitution that that purpose is to be accomplished by the authority of the executive of the State when the legislature has failed to elect a Senator.

Third. The use of language in the Constitution which, according to good and established usage, is sufficient in its ordinary meaning to confer this power on the executive in the case of a vacancy existing for any cause whatever, and at any time whatever while the legislature is not sitting, whether contingent or otherwise.

Fourth. Where like phraseology is used in the Constitution in regard to other offices it has been uniformly held to have the meaning we attribute to it here.

Fifth. The construction given by the very able supreme court of Indiana to language substantially identical.

Sixth. The Senate has for many years past invariably recognized the controlling obligation of this purpose of the Constitution, even where the language is doubtful or where a literal construction would lead to another result.

(a) Where the Constitution says, "If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies," it is held that a Senator so appointed by the executive may sit until the legislature elects a successor or adjourns without such election, in order that the Senate may be full. (See the case of Mr. Winthrop; Taft, Senate Election Cases, 10.)

(b) Where the Constitution says, "That if vacancies happen, etc.," it is held that the executive may appoint in advance of such vacancy, that the Senate may be full. (Case of Mr. Chisholm, Fifty-second Congress; case of Mr. Pasco, Fifty-third Congress.)

(c) Where the Constitution says, "If vacancies happen, etc.," this is held to cover the case of a vacancy by expiration of a term certain and to permit the executive to appoint for the beginning of the following term in case the legislature has not elected, that the Senate may be full. (Case of Mr. Bell; Taft, Senate Election Cases, 26; case of Mr. Blair, ib., 36; case of Mr. Marston.)

(d) Where the Constitution says that "the Senate shall choose * * * a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President," it has been held that the Senate may elect such officer in advance of such absence, that the office may be full. (Election of Mr. Ingalls; election of Mr. Manderson; election of Mr. Harris, March, 1893.)

(e) Where the Constitution says, speaking of the appointment of civil officers, "The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session," it is held that if a vacancy happen when the Senate is in session and continue after its adjournment, the President may fill up such vacancy, that the office may be full.

(f) Where the Constitution says, "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies," it is held that if there should be a vacancy at the beginning of a Representative's term, by failure to elect under the majority rule, or by death, or refusal to serve, or otherwise, the executive of the State may issue such writ of election, that the office may be full.

It has, moreover, been expressly held by the Senate, in the case of Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas—determined in 1837—that where the legislature of Arkansas, being in session when Mr. Sevier's term ended, adjourned without electing his successor, the governor could appoint. The only distinction between that case and the present one is that Mr. Sevier, being a Senator elected by the State upon its admission, drew by lot a term which expired during the session of the legislature and the legislature adjourned before the expiration of his term had come to its knowledge.

The case of Lanman, Taft, Senate Election Cases, page 5, has been distinctly overruled by the Senate, either by the Bell case and those which followed it, or the cases of Chisholm and Pasco above cited.

It is shown by an unbroken line of decisions, with one possible but doubtful exception, that the Senate has maintained the authority of the executive to appoint to a vacancy which occurs at the beginning of a Senatorial term by reason of the failure to elect. We do not think it necessary to insist upon the importance of an adherence by this high court to precedents in judicial matters such as the title to its seats. Unless the Senate, when acting judicially, adhere to its precedents, the rights of the States must depend upon the changing political majorities in this Chamber. It seems quite as important that the construction given by the Senate to the Constitution in proceedings of a judicial nature should be inflexibly adhered to, except in cases of clear error, in spite of the grave and serious temptation which must beset this tribunal beyond all others to depart from them in times of high political excitement. To do justice and declare the law and the fact, without respect of persons or parties, will be the peculiar glory of a tribunal which itself consists of parties deeply interested in the determination. We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Lee Mantle is entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Montana.

Appendix A.

The question has frequently arisen for judgment in the Senate. By a line of decisions unbroken, with one possible exception, it has been held that the governor of a State is authorized to fill a vacancy existing at the beginning of a Senatorial term.

April 27, 1797, William Cocke was appointed a Senator from the State of Tennessee by the governor, his term having expired on the 3d of the preceding month. On the 15th of May, 1797, he presented his credentials, and was admitted to take the oath of office without objection or debate.

March 3, 1801, the seat of Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, became vacant by the expiration of his term of office. On the 20th of February, 1801, the governor of Connecticut reappointed him a Senator. Objection being raised to his credentials, he was admitted to the oath by a vote of yeas 13, nays 10.

William Hindman, of Maryland, was afterwards, on the next day, admitted to the oath on like credentials, without objection.

John Condit, of New Jersey, November 14, 1803, appointed a Senator from New Jersey to fill the vacancy at the beginning of the term, was admitted to take the oath. Mr. Condit's credentials had been presented October 17, previous.

March 4, 1809, Samuel Smith, of Maryland, appointed on that day by the governor of his State to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of his own term, was admitted to his seat and sworn.

March 4, 1809, Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, took his seat by virtue of an appointment from the governor of that State.

May 24, 1813, Charles Cutts, of New Hampshire, appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy during the recess of the legislature, was, without question, admitted to take the oath. This vacancy was at the beginning of the term.

March 4, 1817, John Williams, of Tennessee, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State, to hold said appointment until the meeting of the next session of the legislature, was admitted. His credentials were filed on the 10th of the preceding February.

March 24, 1825, James Lanman, of Connecticut, presented his credentials of his appointment by the governor of that State, "to take effect immediately after the 3d of March, 1825, and to hold the seat until the next meeting of the legislature." Mr. Lanman was refused the seat by a vote of 23 to 13. The case was referred to a select committee, who report the facts, but state neither reason nor conclusion. The committee say they have looked into the journals of the Senate, and that the cases of Cocke, Tracy, Anderson, and Williams are the only analogous cases they could find. There is a brief sketch of the debate in Niles's Register, volume 28, page 32, but no statement of the reason on which any Senator proceeded. There is no historical evidence from which we can determine whether the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of the term, or on the ground that the governor could not lawfully make the appointment in anticipation, before the vacancy occurred, and before he could possibly know whether the legislature might be called together before that time. All the precedents which the committee cite, except that of Mr. Cocke, were cases where the appointment was made not when the vacancy happened in the recess of the legislature, but only when the governor thought it might happen. In the case of Cocke the date of the appointment is not given in the journals, although, in fact, it was after the vacancy. The committee do not cite the case of Hindman, Smith, or Condit, nor the then recent case of Cutts, in deciding which some Senators then in office took part, where the appointments were made after the vacancy existed. There is, therefore, nothing to show whether the Senate meant to overrule all the precedents, some of which were not brought to its attention, or only so many of them as recognized the right of the executive to appoint when a vacancy had not happened.

Judge Story (Constitution, sec. 727, note 2) says: "In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, a question occurred whether the State executive could make an appointment in the recess of the State legislature in anticipation of the expiration of the term of office of an existing Senator. It was decided by the Senate that he could not make such an appointment. The facts were that Mr. Lanman's term of service as Senator expired on the 3d of March, 1825. The President had convoked the Senate to meet on the 4th of March. The governor of Connecticut, in the recess of the legislature (whose session would be in May), on the 9th of the preceding February appointed Mr. Lanman as Senator, to sit in the Senate after the 3d of March. The Senate, by a vote of 23 to 18, decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred." (See Gordon's Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1827; Appendix, note 1, B.)

In regard to the same case, the National Intelligencer of March 8, 1825, says in an editorial note:

"An important constitutional question was yesterday decided in the Senate by the refusal to admit Mr. Lanman to a seat in the Senate under a commission from the governor granted before the expiration of Mr. Lanman's late term of service. This is the first time the question has been adjudicated under such circumstances as to form a precedent; and we presume it may now be considered as a settled construction of the constitutional provision that a vacancy must have literally 'happened,' or come to pass, before an appointment can be made to fill it."

The State of Arkansas was admitted to the Union in 1836. In October, 1836, the legislature of that state elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators. On the allotment of the Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, Mr. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1837. The legislature of Arkansas had no opportunity to fill the vacancy, and were not in session after the result of the allotment was known in that State. January 17, 1837, the governor of Arkansas appointed Mr. Sevier to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. When Mr. Sevier's credentials were presented at the winter session, Mr. Webster suggested a doubt of the validity of the appointment, in which Mr. Sevier himself concurred. At the March session the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Grundy, from that committee, reported in favor of Mr. Sevier's admission, and he was admitted.

Mr. Grundy's report states that it is not intended by the committee to call in question the correctness of the decison in the Lanman case; that that case proceeded on the ground "that the legislature should provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution."

The report further says: "The case now under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Seiver was to go out of office was decided by lot."

From this review of the judgments of the Senate it appears that in every case in which a Senator has been appointed by the executive after the happening of a vacancy by the expiration of a term without an election of a successor by the legislature the person so appointed has been admitted to his seat. There is no indication that the Senate ever denied or doubted the correctness of this construction of the Constitution, except the unsupported statement of Mr. Grundy of the ground of a decision made twelve years before, a statement which nothing in the journal of the debates confirms, and which is opposed to the understanding of Judge Story and the contemporaneous article in the Intelligencer.

The second section of the first article of the Constitution provides: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." In 1837 the law of Mississippi fixed the time for the election of Representatives in November. The President having called a special session of Congress to meet in September, the governor of Mississippi, on the 13th of June, issued writs for an election in July for two Representatives to Congress to fill said vacancy until superseded by the members to be elected at the next regular election in November.

At this July election Messrs. Gholson and Clairborne were elected and claimed the seats. Their claim was referred to a committee, of which Andrew Buchanan was chairman, who reported in favor of their right to seats for the full term. They say in their report:

"The Constitution authorizes the executive power of the States respectively to order the filling of all vacancies which have actually happened, in the mode therein pointed out, no matter how the vacancy may have happened, whether by death, resignation, or expiration of the term of members previous to the election of their successors."

In the debate, John Quincy Adams said he believed, in relation to offices, that every one happens to be vacant which is not full, and that, he believed, was the meaning and sense of the Constitution, whether the vacancy occurred from casualty, the regular course of events, expiration of term, or other cause.

The claimants were admitted to their seats. In November following Messrs. Prentiss and Wood were elected for the same term. At the next December session the resolution declaring Gholson and Clairborne elected was rescinded, but a resolution was also adopted by the casting vote of Speaker James K. Polk, that Prentiss and Wood were not members. So that no inference can properly be drawn from that case, and it is of no value, except so far as weight may be attached to the opinions of John Quincy Adams and James K. Polk, both favoring the construction of the Constitution for which we contend.

Appended to the report in the Mississippi case are opinions of two of the most distinguished Attorneys-General of the United States, Roger B. Taney and William Wirt, in which they discuss the meaning of the phrase "vacancies that may happen during the recess" with reference to the power of the President to fill an office which is vacant in the recess, because the Senate adjourned without acting on a nomination, the original vacancy having happened during the session. Both these eminent jurists agree that the term "happen" is equivalent to "happen to exist," "if it come to pass that there be a vacancy." Mr. Taney says: "The Constitution was formed for practical purposes, and a construction that defeats the very object of the grant of power can not be a true one. It was the intention of the Constitution that the offices created by law should always be full."

We submit, therefore, that the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed, the purpose which the framers of the Constitution meant to accomplish, the unbroken current of decisions in like cases, and the uniform construction given to the same language when used elsewhere in the Constitution and in legislation in like cases, concur in supporting the interpretation which establishes Mr. Bell's claim. The office of Senator is a continuous office. When the Senator is duly elected by the legislature beforehand no vacancy exists within the meaning of the Constitution. His taking the oath of office relates back to the beginning of the term and preserves the continuousness of the succession. He is when on his way to take the oath deemed to be a Senator and privileged from arrest. A vacancy happens, and only happens, when the legislature has failed to make due election or the person chosen declines the appointment or when the office once filled is vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise.

But if we adopt the narrowest possible construction imputed by Mr. Grundy in the Sevier report, the decision in the case of Lanman, the doctrine of the Sevier decision itself, is enough for the purpose of this case. If the failure of the Arkansas legislature to be in session after the expiration of Mr. Sevier's term was decided by lot made the vacancy contingent in the narrowest sense of that term, so that the governor could appoint, certainly the fact that there is no legislature in the State able to act constitutes such a contingency. Whether it so happens that the person once chosen is unable to remain in office, or it so happens that the legislature can not meet and choose, the contingency of a vacancy in the office has occurred. The six months at the end of the term are no more important than six months at its beginning. The Constitution makes equally careful provision for either.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, not being able to agree with the opinion of the majority, beg leave to set forth their reasons for their disagreement, as follows:

Fortunately, there is no disagreement as to the facts in the case of Mr. Mantle, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Montana. The legislature of that State failed to elect, after a full session, a successor to the Hon. W. F. Sanders, whose term expired March 4, 1893. The session of the legislature of that State expired on the 3d of March and it adjourned sine die. The credentials of Mr. Mantle are dated March 4, and certify to his appointment to fill the vacancy which resulted from the expiration of the term of Mr. Sanders.

Substantially the same facts, with the change of names snd dates, attend the appearing here as Senator of the Hon. A. C. Beckwith, of Wyoming, and, with the exception of a single circumstance, the same facts appear in the case of the Hon. John B. Allen, of Washington, who was appointed his own successor by the governor of that State under date of the 10th day of March, 1893. The fact that distinguishes this case from the other two is that the legislature of Washington was in session on the 4th of March, when Mr. Allen's term expired, and remained in session until the 9th of the same month, when it adjoured sine die, without having elected his successor. Unless, therefore, this circumstance should make a difference in the law of the case, they may all three be considered under one head.

The question in each case is, could the governor of the State appoint a Senator at the beginning of a new term, the legislature being in session and refusing or failing to elect? The Constitution of the United States pertaining to this subject, Article I, section 3, provides:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each

State chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall be assembled, in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

In connection therewith and supplementary thereto, may be quoted the provisions of the act of 1866, which we conceive necessary to be considered in the same examination.

This act of Congress makes clear and gives constuction to two points not entirely clear by the express terms of the Constitution, namely, it provides what particular legislature shall elect a successor to one whose term is about to expire; and, secondly, it provides that a legislature in session, when a vacancy occurs, shall fill that vacancy. And this construction of the Constitution has been universally followed ever since.

Its provisions are as follows:

Section 14 of that act says:

"The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress, shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress, etc."

Section 16 of the same act provides that—

"Whenever on the meeting of the legislature of any State a vacancy shall exist in the representation of said State in the Senate, the legislature shall proceed on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization to fill such vacancy in the manner described in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term."

We submit that according to the ordinary acceptation of this language, and by all the well-established rules of construction as laid down by the courts, its plain and obvious meaning can not be mistaken and must be obeyed. There are only two ways by which a citizen can be constituted a Senator of the United States. One, and the primary one, is by the election of the legislatures of the several States—no one doubts that.

The original terms of the Senators of any State must begin by being chosen by the legislature. The other way of becoming a Senator is by appointment of the executive to fill a vacancy which has happened by resignation or otherwise during a recess of the legislature, and which appointments it is provided may be made until the said legislature shall next assemble. These two methods of constituting a Senator were well described by Mr. Pettit in his report on the Phelphs case, as primary and contingent; and as there were two ways of constituting Senators, so there were, obviously, but two ways of creating vacancies; one, the primary way, by the expiration of the constitutional term for which the Senator was elected, the other the accidental, or unforeseen, or unexpected "happening" of some casualty to or upon the incumbent, such as death before his term ended, resignation, expulsion, disqualification, or any other cause that should take him out of the office to which he was elected.

Now, the Constitution having made specific and express provision for filling the original term of each Senator by the legislature, there remained nothing else to provide for except those accidental interruptions of a term which should "happen" to create a vacancy. The manner of this happening and the kind of vacancy or of the cause which might create such a vacancy is signified by the example given, as by "resignation or otherwise." The rule of legal interpretation undoubtedly is that where specific words are used, followed by more general words, the general words are qualified by the specific words. It is thus stated by Willis, justice, in Fenwick v. Schmaltz (L. R. 3, C. P. 315, cited in Endlich, p. 568):

"A general word which follows particular and specific words of the same nature as itself takes its meaning from them and is presumed to be restricted to the same genus as those words; or, in other words, as comprehending only things of the same kind as those designated by them, unless, of course, there is something to show that a wider sense was intended."

Also see the language of Lord Cairns in Ashbury Company v. Rich (L. R. 7, H. L. 653, cited by Sutherland, p. 352). The memorandum of the company said that it was formed for the purpose, among others, of carrying on the business of mechanical engineers and general contractors. A question arising, what was the scope of the concluding words, "general contractors," Lord Cairns said:

"Upon all ordinary principles of construction, those words must be referred to the part of the sentence which immediately precedes them; therefore the term 'general contractors' would be referred to that which goes immediately before, and would indicate the making, generally, of contracts connected with the business of mechanical engineers. If these words were not to be interpreted as I have suggested, the consequence would be that they would stand absolutely without any limit of any kind."

In the Countess of Rothes v. Krikaldy Water Works Commissioners (L. R. 7 App., Cass, 706), the doctrine was announced that "when a specific enumeration concludes with a general term, it is held to be limited to things of the same kind. It is restricted to the same genus as the things enumerated." (See Sutherland Statutory Construction, passim; Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, passim, and the cases there cited.) The books are full of them. There is no learning more familiar. To the same effect is the case of Ham v. The State of Missouri, in 18 Howard, page 126. The plaintiff in error was indicted for a trespass on land belonging to the State of Missouri, which had been granted in 1820 to that State for school purposes, being every sixteenth section of certain boundaries of land. Ham pleaded that by another act in 1811 the Congress of the United States had reserved and set apart from entry and sale certain lands against which there were outstanding claims until said claims had been settled. The terms of the grant to the State of Missouri were of every sixteenth section, "unless the same had been sold or otherwise disposed of." Ham's counsel argued that this reservation from public entry and sale was equivalent to having been "otherwise disposed of," but the court held to the contrary, in the following language:

"The language and plain import of the sixth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1820, confer a clear and positive and unconditional donation of the sixteenth section in every township; and, when these have been sold or otherwise disposed of, other and equivalent lands are granted. Sale, necessarily signifying a legal sale by a competent authority, is a disposion, final and irrevocable, of the land. The phrase, 'or otherwise disposed of,' must signify some disposition of the property equally efficient and equally incompatible with any right of the State, present or potential, as deducible from the act of 1820 and the ordinance of the same."

Here is an unequivocal avowal by the highest court in the United States of the existence of the rule, that the general term must be restricted and governed by the particular term, the particular term here being "sale." The court declared that the disposition "otherwise" must be equivalent and equally efficient in all its legal effects to a sale.

The case of the Thames Insurance Company v. Hamilton was an action upon a policy providing for insurance against all the perils of the sea, and of "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof." The damage alleged was to a donkey engine, which was used in pumping water into the main boiler, and which burst, owing to a valve being closed which ought to have been open.

In the course of the judgment Chancellor Hallsbury said:

"If understood in their widest sense the words are wide enough to include the injury; but two rules, now fairly established as a part of our law, may be considered as limitlng these words. One is that words, however general, may be limited with reference to the subject-matter in relation to which they are used. The other is that general words may be restricted to the same genus as the specific words that precede them. (See Sutherland on Statutory Construction, p. 357.)"

It is not necessary to give more illustrations from the authorities in regard to this rule. Now, apply it to the clause of the Constitution in question.

The method of choosing Senators for a full term had already been provided for by the preceding clause of the section; there remained no other necessity of providing for the filling of Senators' seats except in case of an accidental happening, and this is provided for by the words, "if vacancies shall happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature," etc. Plainly and unmistakably the manner in which such vacancies were to happen are exemplified by the word "resignation," and the addition of the general words, "or otherwise," referred only to the unenumerated methods of a similar kind, by which such accidental vacancy might occur. If we apply the ordinary rules of construction there is no escape from this; but, if, as contended, the word "otherwise" embraces any possible vacancy, then it would be without any limitation or qualification whatever, and the word "resignation" would be eliminated and destroyed. It may be added also, without irreverence, that our respect for the learning and common sense of the framers of our Constitution would be likewise destroyed. If they had intended to provide that the governors should fill every vacancy that could possibly happen during the recess of the legislature, then they would have said so, as they did in the case of a similar provision for filling vacancies in the House which happen in the representation of any State, as provided in the fourth clause of section 2.

But it is said that the word "happen" does not necessarily refer to a casualty or an unexpected event; that in our language we make use of that word indifferently for "occur" "or come to pass." It is respectfully submitted that this is not true. An event that is provided for by law to take place at stated periods known to all men is not correctly spoken of by people of ordinary education as "happening," because there is no element of uncertainty in it. The examples given of statutes providing for certain things to be done on a certain day of a month "if it happen not on a Sunday," etc., will not bear out the assertion. It is true that it might be known to all men who are astronomers, and would sit down and make calculations that a certain date in a certain year would fall on Sunday; but the great masses of mankind do not think of it in that way. They speak as though the thing were absolutely uncertain. But we do not say, for instance, that any natural event, which all men know and look for, did "happen" to come at the time on which it was expected; we do not say that the sun "happened" to rise on a certain day; we do not say that water "happens" to flow down a descent by the force of gravity. That is a known law of nature. We do not say that Christmas "happens" to come on the 25th of December—by the universal consent of Christendom that event comes on that day without peradventure. We do not say that a note "happens" to fall due on the day which is specified in the instrument, though it no doubt is often said that it "happened" to fall due when the maker did not have the money to pay it.

We do not say that Congress happened to meet on the first Monday in December—that is the law. We do not say that a Senator's term in this body happened to expire on the 3d day of March, for that is the law written in the Constitution. We do say, per contra, that Senator A. B. "happened" to die before his term had expired; we do say that Senator C. D. "happened" to resign before his term had expired; we do say that Senator E. F. "happened" to become disqualified by accepting an incompatible office or to be expelled before his term had expired, and so on. In the common acceptation of mankind these phrases are used and understood without controversy. So obvious is their meaning that those who contend for the power of the governor to appoint for any vacancy whatever occurring in the recess of the legislature of a State, are compelled to resort to the argument ab inconvienenti. They say that the paramount purpose of the Constitution is to keep the Senate full, and they dwell upon the importance of the constitutional provision that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

If they mean by this that the purpose of the Constitution is to keep the Senate full by any and all means whatsoever, the statement is not correct. That the Constitution expresses a strong or controlling purpose to keep the representation of each State full in the Senate is manifested by its specific provisions for filling regular terms both at the beginning and as they legally expire, and by providing for any accidental or unforeseen casualties by which seats thus filled might become vacant otherwise than by legal expiration of terms. Further than this no man can say that the Constitution makers intended to go. It can not for a moment be supposed that they contemplated or intended to provide for a case where either the legislature or the governor of a State should wantonly or with any other motive or for any reason either refuse or fail to perform their duty in the creation of Senators. This would have been to express a doubt and want of faith in the perpetuity of the structure which they were building. On the contrary, it is just and reasonable to suppose that, having invested each State with certain specific rights as to representation in this body, and imposed upon them the duty of exercising these rights in a certain specified way, patriotism and self-interest would combine to secure the enjoyment of these rights more effectually than any provision which they could possibly insert in the Constitution.

The paramount purpose of the Constitution, if there be such a thing expressed in any one particular paragraph, we should say, was to keep the Senate full of Senators legally placed there according to the terms of this instrument; to establish a government in accordance with the provisions it lays down. It is illogical in the extreme to contend that the method of supplying a casual vacancy in the Senate contains the controlling purpose of the Constitution. If the frequency and emphasis of the words are considered, much stronger would be the argument that the election of Senators by the legislatures of the States is the controlling purpose. Look at the language: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof"—not appointed by governors or anyone else—"immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election"—not first appointment—"after dividing them into three" classes—the language is—"so that one-third may be chosen"—not appointed—"every two years. And if vacancies happen by resignation, etc., the executive may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The power of the executive is, "may make temporary appointments," while the injunction to the legislature is "shall be chosen"—the one is mandatory and the other is permissive; and yet they say the permissive power controls and is paramount to the mandatory power of the legislature to elect. This language clearly is only intended to give State executives a right to keep the Senate full by appointments, and nothing more.

Again, the next clause says, "that the Senator shall be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen"—not appointed. In section 4, it is provided again,

"The times and places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

In every mention in the Constitution of the creation of Senators, but one, an election is contemplated.

Nor is the argument that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its suffrage in the Senate of any greater force. It almost excites a smile to suggest the idea that a State is deprived by the action of Congress, in any possible way, of her equal suffrage in the Senate if her legislature refuses to elect a Senator and send him here, or if the governor, in the case of a failure of the legislature to elect, shall refuse to appoint a Senator and send him here. Both of these things have happened, and nine States at different times have been for one or more years with but one Senator in these Halls, and no harm happened to State or nation. If a man refuses to go to the ballot box and vote it can hardly be said with any show of propriety that he is "deprived" of his suffrage. He deprives himself. Much is said of the danger and inconvenience arising from the fact that a State would have but one Senator for a short period in this body. It is the opinion of the undersigned, deliberately and solemnly given, that the danger arising in such a manner is not for a moment to be compared with the danger which comes from any departure from the Constitution of the country, in any form, or upon any pretext whatsoever. We know too well that every one of these becomes the basis for a new and wider departure and a justification for any and all violations of the organic law.

We can not but regard as monstrous the doctrine that, while in construing a simple instrument between individuals concerning property, you must give effect to every word, if possible, and make general terms to be limited and controlled by specific words, yet, in construing this great contract, this fundamental law, upon the observance of which shall depend the perpetuity of a great nation, such construction may be given as shall defy all the canons of the courts and destroy specific words of plain and obvious meaning. No stab more vital could be inflicted upon the very existence of the American Union. Nor can we tolerate the idea that we are in any case at liberty to compel a construction of the Constitution in a manner opposed to a clear meaning of particular words and phrases. It is fraught with the elements of tyranny and of destruction to the Government established by that Constitution, and can be justified by no supposed necessity whatever.

The spectacle here presented of three States, at the same time, and in the same manner, and by the same or similar combinations, refusing to perform their constitutional duty of electing Senators to this body, for the purpose of throwing the appointment into the hands of the executive under the vicious precedents which have lately been established, is little short of a scandal upon constitutional government. It enables us to see with what ease a few ambitious and aspiring men in every legislature, by a combination with the executive, can defeat the will of the people and the plain purpose of the Constitution.

In the case of Mr. Allen the vacancy existed while the legislature was in session. In the case of the others, Mr. Mantle and Mr. Beckwith, the legislatures of their States adjourned the day before the vacancies occurred, despite their sworn duty, both under the Constitution and the act of 1866, to provide for filling those vacancies during their sessions.

If legislatures can thus be permitted to tamper with the Constitution and laws of their country and be rewarded with success and impunity, we respectfully submit that a great blow has been inflicted upon the good order and legal government of our country and the permanency of its institutions.

In the discussion of this question in the debates hitherto much importance has been attached to the meaning of the word "happen." We deem it impossible to escape its original and plain meaning. That meaning is to be found in the dictionaries of our tongue. According to Webster it is the intransitive verb based upon the old Saxon noun hap, defined to be "that which happens or comes suddenly or unexpectedly;" also, "the manner of occurrence or taking place; chance; fortune; accident; casual event; fate; lot." The verb "to happen," from the noun hap, defined by same, first, "to come by chance; to come without previous expectation; to fall out;" second, "to take place; to occur," and the example given under the second definition is, "They talked together of all these things which had happened." (St. Luke.)

To the same effect is the Century Dictionary, the noun "hap" being defined to be "chance; luck; fortune," and the intransitive verb "happen" means by same, first, "to occur by chance; occur unexpectedly or unaccountably; in general, to occur; take place;" second meaning, "to chance; be by chance or unexpectedly; as, he happened to be at home."

The Imperial Dictionary says of the noun "hap" that it means "that which takes place or comes suddenly or unexpectedly;" also, the manner of occurrence or taking place; chance; fortune; accident; casual event; vicissitude; and the intransitive verb "happen," by this authority, "to happen; to befall; to come by chance."

As apropos to this word it may be well to refer to another rule of construction, to the effect that the intent of a legislature is to be found in the ordinary meaning of the words of the statute. (Woodworth v. State, 26 Ohio.)

It is thus clear by authority what is a matter of common knowledge, that the primary and ordinary signification of the word "happen" relates to that which is unexpected or accidental, and that its use as synonymous with "take place" or "occur" is secondary.

The accepted canons of construction require that unless there is an indication in the text construed that the meaning of a word therein used is other than the ordinary one, it must be taken to have been used in its ordinary sense.

The majority insist that the word "happen" in the clause of the Constitution in question is used in its secondary meaning of "take place" or "occur."

But in this the undersigned can not concur. They feel constrained, inasmuch as the Constitution itself has not made clear that the word is used in any other than its ordinary sense, to attribute to it that ordinary meaning. That meaning of the word happen controls the scope of the word "otherwise," so that the clause in question must be read according to the ordinary meaning of this word "happen," thus: "And if vacancies unexpectedly occur by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State," etc. It is obvious in this reading that the word otherwise refers to vacancies that unexpectedly occur.

In applying these definitions and legal rules to the clause we are discussing, if the words "or otherwise" are not limited to vacancies occurring in a manner similar to a "resignation" of a Senator, it would seem impossible to make an idea plain by the use of language. It can not refer to a vacancy occurring by the regular expiration of a term. That suggestion is excluded by the previous mention in special words of those terms, provision in like special words being made for filling them; therefore the next clause is independent and entirely disconnected from that preceding it, inasmuch as it refers and must refer to the filling of a vacancy happening otherwise than by the expiration of a regular term. The enlarging or general words used by the authorities must relate to the same kind of things to which the special words relate. They must be ejusdem generis, as the law says. Now the only possible kindred between the accidental and the regular termination of Senatorial seat is that they are both vacancies, but they are not ejusdem generis, in that the one is a vacancy created by law and the other is a vacancy created by accident, and are entirely different in their legal effects. The one is a basis for the exercise of executive power; the other is not.

Apropos to the argument of the controlling purpose of the Constitution being to keep the Senate full—suppose the governor of a new State should appoint two Senators to begin with and send them here with their credentials, alleging that there was a vacancy, and with or without an apology for the absence of a legislative election? Must we receive them because of the importance of keeping the Senate full; or because without its consent we must not deprive a State of its equal suffrage in the Senate? Surely it will not be so contended. It has been decided, and we believe at the present moment the contrary is not contended by anyone, that if the governor of a State has exercised his power of appointment until the meeting of the legislature, and the legislature has assembled and adjourned without filling that vacancy, that the governor can not again exercise the appointing power.

This was decided in the case of Jared Williams, from New Hampshire, 1854, and so far as we can learn has never been overruled.

Mr. Edmunds admitted this in the discussion of the Bell case. Mr. Wadleigh admitted this in the discussion of Mr. Cameron's bill, which was intended to cure the defect caused by the adoption of the new constitution of New Hampshire, which prevented an election of a Senator at the proper time.

Mr. Blaine admitted it in the same discussion. Mr. Edmunds's language is as follows:

"The Constitution is looking to have each State represented in this body all the time, and by some method that the Constitution provides and looks to to do it, and, therefore, when it uses the word "otherwise," it uses the comprehensive term, so that, in whatever way the State ceases to have opportunity to express its full voice here in this council of States, it shall be filled temporarily by the governor until the legislature, the chief and sovereign power in the State, at its next meeting can have an opportunity to fill it. Then, if they fail in their constitutional duty, the Constitution as it was made has not thought fit to give the governor any other power. That is the state of the case."

If this be true what becomes of the argument?

The long and the short of it, as was stated by Mr. Carpenter in the discussion of the Bell case, is simply "that the Constitution of the Union guaranties to every State the right of perpetual representation in this body." There is no other guaranty on the part of the Constitution toward a State representation in the Senate. If the State neglect or refuse to avail itself of that right there is no obligation on the part of the Senate or of any other authority to force or compel by forced construction or any other means to insure that perpetual representation than simply this plain provision of the Constitution. We can neither compel a legislature to elect, nor a governor to appoint. In a government based on the consent of the governed something must necessarily be left to the patriotism and common sense of those to whom the government is intrusted.

The precedents set by this body upon the subject of executive appointments are quite numerous. The oldest case was that of Kensey Johns, of the State of Delaware. He was appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy occasioned by the resignation of George Read, in December, 1793. The legislature met in January, 1794, and adjourned in February of the same year without having elected a successor to Mr. Read. Mr. Johns was appointed by the governor on the 19th of March to fill said vacancy. He was refused his seat on the ground that since the occurrence of the vacancy a session of the legislature had intervened. The vote for the resolution refusing him his seat was 20 ayes to 7 nays. Among those participating in this early case in 1794 were several Senators who had taken part in the formation of the Constitution, as we are informed.

The next case was that of Mr. Tracy, from Connecticut, whose term expired March 3, 1801, who was appointed his own successor by the governor of the State on the 20th of February, 1801, and appeared to take his seat on March the 4th following. He was admitted by a vote of 13 yeas to 10 nays. It appears that there was little or no debate. From 1799 to 1817 it appears that several Senators, by appointment, were sworn in without objection. These, though fairly citable for the purpose of showing the opinion of the Senate at that time, can not properly be cited as adjudicated cases. This admitting, without objection, such Senators, received its death blow in 1814 by the discussion of Mr. Gore's resolution concerning the President's power to fill original vacancies. Although they were never finally acted on, the light thrown on the subject no doubt influenced the subsequent action of the Senate.

The next, and perhaps the leading case, which was fully and ably discussed and solemnly decided, was that of James Lanman, of Connecticut, in 1825. Mr. Lanman's term expired March 3, 1825; on March 4 of the same year he was appointed by the governor to fill the vacancy. His credentials were dated February 8, but he appeared to take his seat at an extra session of the Senate convened by the President on March 4. His credentials upon objection were referred to a special committee, Senators Eaton, Edwards, and Tazewell, which committee reported the facts and precedents, but divided as to conclusions, the majority of the committee, Eaton and Tazewell, favoring the rejection of Lanman, the minority, Edwards, favoring his admission to a seat. Whereupon Edwards submitted, not as the report of the committee, but on his own account, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Hon. James Lanman, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Connecticut, be now admitted to the oath required by the Constitution."

And the vote being taken, after discussion, the resolution was rejected, yeas, 18; nays, 23; the majority of the select committee, Eaton and Tazewell, voting in the negative.

The case of Ambrose H. Sevier, from the State of Arkansas, came up at a special session of the Senate in March, 1837. The State of Arkansas had been admitted to the Union in June, 1836, and in October of the same year the legislature elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators. On the allotment of these Senators to their respective class, as required by the Constitution, Mr. Sevier was placed in the class whose term expired on the 3d of March, 1837. The legislature of Arkansas, though in session at the time, had no opportunity to fill the vacancy, having adjourned before the result of the allotment at Washington became known to them. Mr. Sevier was appointed to succeed himself and fill the vacancy occasioned by drawing that lot. His credentials were dated January 17, 1837, and at the special session in March, after the occurrence of the vacancy, his credentials were referred to the Committee on Judiciary for special report.

That committee decided that his case came fairly within the provisions of the Constitution contained in the third section of the first article, which declares "that a vacancy happened by resignation or otherwise," and reported a resolution that he be permitted to take the oath required by the Constitution, which resolution was adopted—yeas, 26; nays, 19. The committee consisted of Messrs. Grundy, Chittenden, Morris, King of Georgia, and Wall, and they based their report upon the ground that the vacancy was occasioned by the lot which assigned the short term to Mr. Sevier, and, therefore, was a happening within the meaning of the Constitution. They reaffirmed and acquiesced in the doctrine laid down in the Lanman case, and declared that by making this decision they did not call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is, said the committee, "that the legislature of the State, by making elections themselves, shall provide for all vacancies which may occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution."

This decision of the Lanman case was acquiesced in for about fifty years, being reaffirmed again and again. So well was it recognized and obeyed that in nine different States between the years 1843 and 1859 the governors thereof refused to appoint Senators, the legislature having failed to elect.

In 1879 the case of Charles H. Bell from New Hampshire came up for consideration. Mr. Bell was appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the legislature by the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term on March 3, 1879. By a change in the constitution of the State of New Hampshire, the date of the election of the legislature for that State, and of its subsequent assembling, was so changed as to render it impossible for the legislature last preceding the election of the Senator to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term, as required by the act of 1866, thus leaving a vacancy between the beginning of the new term and the assembling of the legislature which had been chosen next preceding the commencement of said term. Mr. Bell was appointed to fill this vacancy. After discussion he was admitted, but the undersigned contend that this was not an overruling of the long-established and acquiesced-in principle of the Lanman case, because the legislature of New Hampshire had not had the opportunity to elect a Senator. By the act of 1866 the outgoing legislature could not make the election because it was not the one elected next preceding the vacancy. The legislature elect could not choose the Senator because, by the constitution of New Hampshire, it could not assemble until June following the vacancy; so the legislature was in no fault.

The case of Blair was on all fours with Bell, being appointed by the governor of New Hampshire under precisely the same circumstances, and, of course, followed the decision in the Bell case. It may be said, therefore, generally, that the first well-debated and solemnly decided case by those who were near to the framers of the Constitution, took decided ground against the power of the governor to appoint, where it was possible for the legislature to perform its duty; and with a few exceptions between the year 1800 and 1817, the acquiescence in the doctrine established by the case of Kensey Johns was unbroken, down to the year 1879, if it was broken then, by the admission of Mr. Bell, and we insist it was not for the reasons above stated.

The minority report of Senators A. P. Butler and J. A. Bayard in the case of Samuel S. Phelps, which was sustained, denying Mr. Phelps his seat, is well worthy of consideration. They say:

"The Senate of the United States is composed of organized constituencies—the State legislatures; to them belong the power primarily of electing their Senators when they are in session, at the happening of vacancies, at their first meeting when it happens in their recess, and on them devolves the exclusive jurisdiction of filling such vacancies. Their right and authority to fill or supply vacancies, which have been primarily filled by executive appointment, are as absolute and exclusive as was their right in an original election. When their power is brought into existence, it must supersede all others, with this qualification, and that according to precedent, they have a session to make the choice. In our view it does not depend on the actual exertion of the power to elect, but upon its existence. A Senator, under an executive appointment, may or may not represent the political views of his State. He may be the mere personal favorite of the governor. The Senate, as far as practicable, should be made to represent its constitutional constituency, and in this respect should preserve the republican feature of our Union." (See Senate Election Cases, p. 20.)

The undersigned, therefore, asserting neither that the Constitution should be strictly constructed nor freely construed, but that it should be construed according to the usual and accepted rules of interpretation, so as to give effect to its plain and unmistakable meaning; and believing earnestly that an executive appointment to fill a vacancy caused by the expiration of a regular term of a Senator, the legislature of the State being in session at the time when by law it should have filled such vacancy itself, and failing to perform that duty is not within the scope and meaning of the power granted to State executives by article 1, section 3, of the Constitution, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Lee Mantle is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Montana.

Z. B. VANCE.
GEORGE GRAY.
JOHN M. PALMER.
JOHN H. MITCHELL.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

The resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Lee Mantle was the subject of debate in the Senate March 29, 1893 (Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pp. 38–47), March 30, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 50–66), April 3, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 68–74), April 4, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 75–79), April 5, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 80–89), April 6, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 93–96), August 7, 1893 (Ibid., p. 225), August 14, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 289, 290), August 15, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 332–337), August 16, 1893 (Ibid., p. 393), August 17, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 421–429), August 21, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 540–545), and August 23, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 676–688).

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Pugh in support of the resolution that Mr. Mantle be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Montana. Found in the Congressional Record, vol. 25, pp. 38–40.]

"Mr. President, the importance of the question presented by the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections will be conceded, and the necessity for a solution of it by the Senate that will be accepted hereafter as final can not be questioned. The conditions and results inseparable from the discussion, consideration, and determination of the right of the appointee of a governor to fill the vacancy existing in the Senate have unfortunately been influenced more or less by the fact that the appointee was a Democrat or Republican, as is shown by the division of the votes of Senators on party lines; and when once committed it is difficult for the Senator, on reconsideration of the same question, to give due weight to arguments against the soundness of his former decision. The question as it is now presented is freer from political surroundings and in a better condition to be decided on its real merits than at any time when heretofore determined.

"The first inquiry to which I direct the attention of the Senate is as to the facts in each of the three cases of the States of Montana, Wyoming, and Washington. In each of the cases the terms of the Senator elected by the legislature of his State expired on the 4th day of the present month. In each of the States the legislature had met and organized some time prior to the 4th of March, when the seat of one of the Senators from each State was vacated by operation of the Constitution. In each of the States the legislature, in accordance with the act of Congress of 1866, proceeded to elect a Senator to fill the vacancy, and continued in daily session to elect until the existence of the legislature was terminated by an express provision of the constitution of each State, and when thus terminated the power of the legislature in each State expired, leaving the seats of each of the Senators vacated and the three States without their constitutional representation.

"In the case of Montana and Wyoming, the sessions of the legislature expired by constitutional limitation a few days before the 4th of March, when the seats of the Senators were vacated. In the case of the State of Washington, the legislature expired by constitutional limitation after the 4th of March; so that in the former two States the vacancy occurred after the termination of the life of the legislature, and, of course, during its recess, while in the State of Washington the vacancy in the Senate occurred while the legislature was in session.

"The foregoing are the undisputed facts and all the facts upon which the question of constitutional law arises—whether the governors of the States are invested with the power of filling the vacancies in the Senate of the United States admitted to exist in the manner and under the circumstances I have stated. We can look nowhere for the power to fill these vacancies in the Senate except in the Constitution of the United States.

"In the first article and third section of the Constitution we find the following words:

" 'The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each

State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

"'Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"The above quotations are all the provisions of the Constitution relating to filling and keeping the Senate full of two Senators from each State at all times. It will be observed that there are only two modes provided of securing to each State at all times a full representation of two Senators: (1) By having them 'chosen' permanently by the legislature of the State, and (2) when 'vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"How is the representation kept full in the House of Representatives? The second section of the Constitution provides for representation in the House on the basis of population, and that 'each State shall have at least one representative,' and 'when vacancies happen in the representation from any State the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.'

"'Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.'

"How are all the offices of the United States kept full so that the public service suffer no detriment?

"The second section of Article II provides that the President 'shall nominate, and by and with the advise and consent of the Senate shall appoint * * * all officers of the United States,' and 'the President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.'

"The foregoing extracts from the Constitution embrace everything in it relating directly or indirectly to every aspect of the questions before the Senate. The next source of information to which I call the special attention of the Senate is what was said and done in the convention that framed the above provisions of the Constitution to shed light on their objects and true meaning.

"In Elliott's Debates, found in the Madison Papers, at page 377, Mr. Rutledge, on the 6th of August, 1787, reported from the committee of detail as follows:

"'Article V, section 1. The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.'

"This provision, reported by the committee of detail, was under consideration on the 9th of August. The whole proceeding on Article V, section 1, as I have quoted it, appears as follows, just as it stands in the debates:

"'Mr. Wilson objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the legislatures will meet so frequently. It removes the appointment too far from the people, the executives in most of the States being elected by the legislatures. As he had always thought of the appointment of the executive by the legislative department wrong, so it was still more so that the executive should elect into the legislative department.

"'Mr. Randolph thought it necessary in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate. In some States the legislatures meet but once a year. As the Senate will have more power and consist of a smaller number than the other House, vacancies there will be of more consequence. The executives might be safely trusted, he thought, for so short a time.

"'Mr. Ellsworth. It is said that the executive may supply vacancies. When the legislative meeting happens to be near the power will not be exerted. As there will not be but two members from a State, vacancies may be of great moment.'

"You will see that the word 'happens' is used by Mr. Ellsworth in reference to the meeting of the legislature, which is always fixed by law.

"'Mr. Williamson. Senators may resign or not accept. This provision is therefore absolutely necessary.

"'On the question of striking out 'vacancies shall be supplied by the executives,' the vote stood—Pennsylvania, aye—1; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, no—8; Maryland, divided.

"'Mr. Williamson moved to insert after 'vacancies shall be supplied by the executives,' the words, 'unless other provision shall be made by the legislature of the State.'

"'Mr. Ellsworth was willing to trust the legislature or the executive of a State, but not to give the former a discretion to refer appointments for the Senate to whom they pleased.

"'On the question of Mr. Williamson's motion, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, aye—4; New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, no—6.'

"Now Mr. Madison speaks, and I desire Senators to hear him:

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after 'vacancies' and insert the words 'happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"Making the power of the legislature and the governor to fill vacancies that happen coequal.

"Mr. HOAR. Will the honorable Senator from Alabama permit me to make a suggestion, which I dare say may be in his plan of remarks, that that difficulty arose from the rule in the English House of Commons, which is familiar to all Senators, which did not permit a member of the House of Commons to vacate his office by resignation.

"Mr. PUGH. And thereby create a vacancy.

"Mr. HOAR. To this day I believe the fiction is kept up, and when a member of the House of Commons desires to vacate his seat he accepts another office—the Chiltern Hundreds; he gets out of it in that way. That was what made the language seem necessary to Mr. Madison.

"Mr. PUGH. It was upon that state of facts that doubts arose as to the right of a Senator to resign and thereby create a vacancy.

"'Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. This is absolutely necessary; as members chosen in the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it will be in the power of the legislature, by appointing a man as Senator against his consent, to deprive the United States of his services.

"'The motion of Mr. Madison was agreed to nem. con.'

"Here is proof as strong as language can make it that no opposition was ever expressed in the convention that framed the Constitution, except by one State, to granting power to the executives of the States to fill vacancies that happen in the Senate from any cause at any time. No mention is made of how a vacancy should happen, or that it should be of any particular kind or character, to be imparted to it by the cause or event or fact that produced it. There was no attempt to limit the executive power to fill vacancies.

"The existence of the vacancy from any cause was the crucial test of executive power to fill it. Then why were the words 'by resignation or otherwise' inserted? Plainly and undoubtedly for the purpose, as declared then and there by Madison, the author and mover of the language, and by Gouverneur Morris, the supporter of Madison's motion, of removing all doubt as to the right of Senators to resign, and not doubts as to the power of the executives to fill vacancies to keep the Senate full to preserve the equality of representation.

"The manifest and declared purpose of inserting the words 'by resignation or otherwise' was to protect the rights of Senators, and not to interfere with or limit or qualify the power of the governors to fill all vacancies that happen to exist in the Senate. The word 'resignation' removed all doubts as to the rights of Senators by express specification, and the words 'or otherwise' were added to preserve the power of the executives to fill vacancies to the full extent that it would exist by the use of the words which eight States refused to strike out on the motion of a single State.

"Mr. President, I have read to the Senate every provision of the Constitution and all that was said by the authors of these provisions at the time they were adopted, and it seems to me that there is nothing upon which to base a reasonable doubt, and all the minority of the committee can do is to turn the Senate into a college of philologists, to teach each other etymology, syntax, and prosody, and speculate on what Washington, and Franklin, and Madison, and Ellsworth, and Gouverneur Morris really intended that then existing and future generations who were to be governed under the Constitution to be submitted to each State for ratification should understand from the language of the Constitution, and where the power was invested to keep the Senate and House and executive offices full, so that each State should have two Senators in the Senate and at least one Representative in the House and every executive office an incumbent.

"The language of the Constitution was not selected by philologists or technical lawyers, but by statesmen, who used plain, comprehensive words to give expression to their strong common sense and practical knowledge of the fundamental objects and uses of free representative government.

"The words in the Constitution that give rise to all the contention and difference of opinion as to where the power resides to fill vacancies in the Senate are the following:

"'And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"I have shown all the history of the use of those words. It is an axiomatic rule of construction of words and sentences, wherever found, to ascertain the intention, purpose, and object of those using the language, and then, if practicable, to adopt the meaning that will execute the intention and accomplish the object of the authors.

"There can be no controversy about the importance of the object intended to be accomplished by declaring that 'the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, and each Senator shall have one vote.' How shall two Senators be assured to each State at all times? Was it considered possible under any circumstances or conditions existing or that could exist at any time that a State could be deprived of its full representation of two Senators?

"If such a possibility could have been discovered by the framers of the Constitution in the insufficiency or uncertainty in the meaning of the words used to provide against such a material and revolutionary probability or possibility, would they have failed to avoid it by the insertion of words that would have excluded all doubts as to the happenings of such possible consequences? It is a reflection upon the capacity and intelligence of the framers of the Constitution to charge that their paramount object to keep the Senate full is to be defeated by their intentional or careless or ignorant selection of words to carry out their main purpose that they ought to have known were wholly inadequate to accomplish such object. What language of the Constitution can be tortured into the discovery of the intention, desire, or anticipation of its framers that the power should exist anywhere in the framework of our dual system of government by action or nonaction of any of the agencies provided to keep the Senate full to deprive any State of equal representation in that great lawmaking body?

"It is claimed by the philologists in the Senate who deny the power of the governors of Montana, Wyoming, and Washington to fill the vacancies in the Senate from those States that no such vacancies exist in the Senate, because the vacancies there did not 'happen' in a constitutional sense; that the only 'vacancies' the governors can fill are those that 'happen' in the sense that word was used in the Constitution, and that is, that 'happen' is a descriptive term, used by the framers of the Constitution to define particular kinds of vacancies—vacancies having a specific character imparted to them by the cause or event or fact that produced them; that the cause, event, or fact that produced the vacancies that 'happen' in a constitutional sense is an accidental cause, an accidental event, an accidental fact happening by chance, that no power of foresight, forethought, or anticipation could discover, such as the resignation, death, or removal of a Senator.

"The existence of vacancies in the Senate from those States mentioned must be admitted as a physical fact, shown by occular demonstration. Each of these States has only one Senator, when the Constitution in mandatory language requires that each of them shall have two Senators. Neither is it denied that the constitutional right to two Senators is just as much impaired by a vacancy that exists from any cause as it is by a vacancy that happens by chance or accident. The framers of the Constitution must have known that any other vacancy was the same in effect as a vacancy that happens by chance or accident. They provided for a vacancy that happened by chance or accident, but a vacancy that was an anticipated certainty, like the termination of a six-year term on the 4th of March, they made no provision for filling except by an election by the State legislature.

"A vacancy that happened by chance or accident pending a six-year term could be filled in two ways—by an election by the legislature or by an appointment by the governor. But vacancies that exist by operation of law, it is claimed by the minority, can only be filled by the legislature, and that vacancies that happen in a six-year term by the occurrence of an unexpected fact can be filled by the governor or the legislature. There is no conceivable reason for, and no possible evil to be remedied by, this difference in the power to fill vacancies in the Senate. There is about as much substance in the difference and reason for it as there is in the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

"If we take Washington and Franklin among the dictionaries, with which the philolgists in the Senate must presume these illustrious statesmen were familiar and must have frequently consulted to find fit and proper words to convey their exact meaning, we are unable to discover any word in the English language that could be preferred to the word 'happen' to give expression to their full meaning as to the 'vacancies' the executives were to have power to fill in the Senate.

"Mr. Whitney, the author of the Century Dictionary, has shown as much learning and research in his analysis of English words to ascertain their derivation and most reliable meaning as any philologist who ever published a dictionary. He enjoyed the advantage of having studied the dictionaries and works of all his predecessors, and his Century Dictionary is established as among the highest standard authorities.

"In the Century Dictionary the word 'happen' is defined in its particular and general meaning, and it embraces completely the accidental and chance causes and the causes that can be anticipated. 'Happen,' says the Century Dictionary: '1. To occur by chance; occur unexpectedly or unaccountably; in general, to occur; to take place.' In other words, and unmistakably, the general difinition in the dictionaries, 'vacancies that happen to exist,' as decided by every Attorney-General of the United States in analogous cases where the same words are used in the Constitution."

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Mitchell, of Oregon, in opposition to the resolution that Mr. Mantle be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Montana. Found in the Congressional Record, vol. 25, pp. 51, 54–57, 65.]

"Mr. President, the question involved in the proposition now before the Senate is not only one of the highest privilege, but of transcendent importance. It is one the solution of which does not depend on the determination of any question of fact, but rests solely upon constitutional and statutory construction. It is, therefore, a question in the consideration and determination of which no element of partisanship can be permitted, and I am sure will not be permitted, to enter. It may seem somewhat strange that there should be, after the lapse of over one hundred years since the adoption of our Constitution, room for any serious differences of opinion as to whether the executive of a State has or has not the constitutional power in a given case to confer upon a citizen by appointment the right to a seat, temporarily or otherwise, in this body; and yet the report in the case under consideration and the debate now in progress clearly show that this is so.

* * * * * * *

"We are told with great confidence that the theory of the Constitution is that it was so constructed in its various provisions relating to the choosing of United States Senators that the Senate shall always have its full complement of members present in this body, so that, in the language of the report of the majority, the Senate 'shall be kept full—always full.' Grant, for the sake of the argument, that this is so; and grant further that it is always a matter of deep regret that there should be a vacant seat from any State for any considerable length of time; yet in all confidence I submit that an occasional vacancy for a brief time in the representation of a State or two States, or a half dozen States for that matter, is an evil infinitesimal in degree and character, in importance and consequences, compared with that overshadowing evil which must necessarily result from the recognition of a construction or the approval of a doctrine that will eventuate in admitting to a seat in the Senate a single member who is lacking in the proper constitutional title. There is but one way, it is respectfully submitted, by which Senators can be rightfully chosen under our present Constitution, either for a full term or to fill a vacancy, and that is by the legislatures of the States, respectively.

"The executive of a State has no constitutional power to choose a Senator for a State; no, not for even the briefest possible period of time. That belongs alone and exclusively under the Constitution to the legislature. The executive, however, is, by a certain carefully prescriped, clearly defined, limited constitutional grant, clothed with the prerogative which he alone can exercise, as I shall confidently contend, only after a Senator has been thus chosen by the proper constitutional authority—the legislature—and a vacancy in that Senator's term so chosen subsequently happens 'by resignation or otherwise' by which he can, in the event such vacancy or vacancies happen 'during the recess of the legislature,' not choose a Senator, not even fill the vacancy, but make 'temporary appointments until the meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy.'

"The primary and constitutional power, therefore, both of choosing Senators for full terms, whether these terms be for two, four, or six years, and also of filling vacancies which may occur in those terms, belongs under the Constitution exclusively to the legislature of the State, and the only constitutional power inhering in the executive of a State in respect of this important function is not to choose a Senator, not to fill a vacancy, because these are functions clearly vested by the Constitution exclusively in the legislature, but to make 'temporary appointments' in case vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature.

* * * * * * *

"In the light of these observations let us consider the provisions of the Constitution under consideration and endeavor to arrive at a conclusion as to their correct interpretation.

"The minority of the committee hold to the view that inasmuch as the Constitution in plain and specific terms provides in the first instance for certain definite specific terms of Senators—first of six years, then four, then two years—by virtue of the classification to be made immediately after assembling in consequence of the first election, and then provides—that the vacancy contemplated and referred to is a vacancy occurring by resignation or otherwise in one or the other of these fixed and definitely described terms, and that it has no reference whatever to any condition that may exist at the expiration of any of these regular terms, and this is so for a great number of reasons; first, because it is the constitutional duty of the legislature of a State, not only in virtue of the provisions of the Constitution itself, but doubly so in virtue of the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, to provide by election in advance of such a vacancy for a successor to a Senator whose full term is about to expire; and it was never contemplated, as we submit, that the legislature, no less than the executive, of a State would fail to perform this great constitutional function.

"In other words, we confidently insist for the reasons already fully indicated that the vacancy referred to in the Constitution is a something that must be carved out of a term to which a Senator has been chosen. It is a vacancy that must 'happen,' not by a predetermined fact, not by the occurrence of something we all know long in advance of its occurrence is absolutely sure to occur at a certain date, but a vacancy which 'happens by resignation or otherwise'—that is, which happens in some such manner as a resignation, in some like manner, some unexpected manner, in some manner that we did not anticipate, some manner we did not expect, some like unexpected and unanticipated manner, such as death, abandonment, expulsion, or other like unexpected occurrence, and not only by resignation, but otherwise.

"The able Senator from Alabama [Mr. Pugh] in his speech on yesterday, devoted considerable space to a consideration of the proceedings of the convention which framed the Constitution, and thought he could see in these an argument in favor of that construction of that portion of the instrument relating to temporary appointments of Senators by the executives of States so ably contended for by him. A consideration of these proceedings is both interesting and instructive; but as I shall contend, and as I believe I can demonstrate, so far from furnishing any argument in favor of the construction for which he contends, they furnish a very strong argument against that construction. In the original 'plan of a Federal constitution,' submitted to the convention by Mr. Charles Pinckney on the 29th day of May, 1787, it was provided that the Senate of the United States should be chosen by the House of Delegates. That plan contemplated assigning to each State, not an equal number of Senators, but to some States a greater and some a less number, and the provision in that plan relating to vacancies read as follows:

"'As their terms of service expire the House of Delegates shall fill them up by elections for —— years; and they'—

"That is, the House of Delegates—

"'shall fill all vacancies that arise from death or resignation for the time of service remaining of the members so dying or resigning.'

"This plan, therefore, provided, as in the Constitution as it stands to-day, on this subject, a tribunal—not the legislature of a State, it is true, but the House of Delegates—as the House of Representatives was called at that time, whose constitutional duty it should be to not only choose the Senators originally, but their successors from time to time as their terms might expire, and then provided that that same tribunal should fill all vacancies occurring from death or resignation, thus keeping up clearly the distinction between the filling of a term originally and the filling of vacancies that might occur in such term precisely as we claim is the case in the Constitution as finally adopted.

"In the report of the committee of detail submitted to the convention by Mr. Rutledge August 6, 1787, the clause on this subject read as follows:

"'The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.'

"It will thus be seen that in the original draft from the committee of detail, the simple term 'vacancies' without any limitation or qualification whatever was employed. Neither the word 'happen' nor the words 'by resignation or otherwise' were included. It was simply, 'Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"When the matter came up for discussion in the convention Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. He said it was unnecessary, as the legislatures will meet so frequently. 'It removes,' said he, 'the appointment too far from the people, the executives in most of the States being elected by the legislatures. As he had always thought the appointment of the executive by the legislative branch wrong, so it was still more so that the executive should elect into the legislative department.'

"While Mr. Randolph argued that it was necessary in order to prevent, to use his own language, 'inconvenient chasms in the Senate.'

"'True," Mr. Williamson said, as stated by Senator Pugh in his argument yesterday, 'that Senators might resign or not accept.' He said that, but he did not say, 'true, a legislature may fail to elect.' He did not state that as a reason why this power should be given to an executive. Nobody said that in the convention. They did say that a man chosen might die or might refuse to accept, but no one ever suggested in the convention a case where the legislature should fail to elect, and not one of the distinguished Senators who favor the report of the committee in this case can point it out.

"Mr. VANCE. If my colleague on the committee will allow me, I should like to ask him a question, which I think is pertinent in this connection.

"Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Certainly.

"Mr. VANCE. Can the Senator point out any case in the Constitution where a duty is primarily imposed upon an officer therein named, the performance of that duty is conferred upon another officer contingent upon the failure of the first officer to perform his duty?

"Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. There is no such case in the Constitution. It can not be found. I have been trying here for the last half hour or more to demonstrate that very thing. I have been trying to prove that the men who framed the Constitution, after having designated a tribunal to perform a constitutional function, never dreamed of providing a substitute to perform that constitutional function in the event of a failure upon the part of the tribunal thus constitutionally provided to do its duty.

"Now, whatever may have been the intention of the committee of detail, whether they intended that the words 'vacancies shall be supplied by the executives' should include a case of a vacancy occurring at the expiration of a term, it is absolutely clear beyond all question that the clause as reported by the committee of detail would, by proper construction, include a case such as that now before the Senate, and had the convention stopped in its attempt to reform this particular provision of the report of the committee of detail with the vote refusing to strike out these words 'vacancies shall be supplied by the executives,' then I, for one, would have no trouble whatever in agreeing with the majority of the committee. But, unfortunately for the argument of the committee and of the able Senators from Alabama [Mr. Pugh] and from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar], the convention, while they determined by this decisive vote that the executives of States should be empowered to fill vacancies, determined later on that they would define and fix by appropriate language the character of the vacancies which should thus be filled by the executives of States. And several propositions were submitted looking to limiting and qualifying the words 'vacancies shall be supplied by the executives.'

"One motion made by Mr. Williamson was to insert, after the words 'vacancies shall be supplied by the executives,' the words 'unless other provision shall be made by the legislature,' and this proposition was combated by Mr. Ellsworth, who declared that he was willing to trust the legislature of a State, but not to give the former—the legislature—a discretion to refer appointments for the Senate to whom they pleased. Consequently the motion of Mr. Williamson was voted down by 4 ayes and 6 noes. Then it was that Mr. Madison moved to strike out of the clause, as reported by the committee of detail, all after the words 'vacancies' and insert in lieu thereof the words 'happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.' True, this proposition of Mr. Madison was in the first instance agreed to nem. con.

"Now, Mr. President, if we were to admit that if the clause had remained in that form, that then the construction contended for by the committee and by the Senators from Massachusetts and Alabama would be the correct one; but this I deny and will conclusively show, I think, in a moment, unfortunately again for the argument of the committee and of the distinguished Senators who hold to that view, this portion of the Constitution was not left in this form, but as signed by the members of the Convention was remodeled and put in form as it stands to-day.

"In other words, the clause 'by refusals to accept,' which was a part of Mr. Madison's motion, was stricken out, so that while by the report of the committee of detail, as well as amended by the motion of Mr. Madison, the executives of States were authorized until the next meeting of the legislature to fill a vacancy that might occur, not only by resignation or some such like cause, but also by vacancy caused by refusal to accept on the part of a person theretofore duly chosen Senator by the legislature, the provision, as finally remodeled, was entirely changed in this respect. Whatever, therefore, may have been the intention originally, or even throughout, of some of the members of that Convention, it seems to me perfectly clear that the final action of the Convention—and that is what we must look to to get the final conclusion of the mind of the Convention—limited the vacancies which could be filled by the executive to those carved out of a term by resignation or some other like cause, such as death, abandonment, or expulsion.

"And now, in attempting a construction of these constitutional provisions, it is worth while to inquire if it were the intention of the framers of the Constitution to confer authority on the executives of States to make temporary appointments in all cases of vacancies in a seat that might occur, or, if you please, happen, why were the four words 'by resignation or otherwise' inserted in the Constitution?

"With these four words omitted there would be much reason for holding that the governor would have the power to temporarily appoint whenever there was a vacancy occurring during a recess of the legislature, no matter how happening, no matter how occurring—whether by death, resignation, expulsion, or the expiration of a term. In other words, in such a case one might well hesitate to deny that the clause would mean what the majority of the committee contend it now means with these four words in. All would agree that an authority to fill vacancies occurring, if the word 'occur' instead of 'happen' had been used, would include all vacancies, no matter how occurring.

"Most of us would, perhaps not all, agree that vacancies happening where there were no words of limitation upon the term 'vacancies' would include all vacancies in a seat, no matter how occurring, and this is my view. And I will here state, in giving construction to this clause of the Constitution, I do not personally, perhaps, place so much weight as some do on the word 'happen' as in and of itself, when unqualified by other words, as so distinctly controlling the interpretation, as I do on the words 'by resignation or otherwise.' The word 'happen,' I admit, may have different meanings, the meaning depending entirely on the sense in which it is used, on the connection in which it is employed, on the subject-matter to which it relates, on the event to which it is applied, and the qualifying words employed in connection with this word.

"But what is the meaning of the word 'otherwise' in the connection in which it is employed in the phrase 'If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise?'

"The distinguished Senators from Massachusetts and Alabama, and other Senators who support the majority report, claim that the word 'otherwise' in this connection means 'in any other manner,' while we of the minority contend that under the well-settled and universally recognized rules of constitutional and statutory construction it means 'in like manner,' or some such manner as resignation.

"It is a well-settled rule of judicial decision that where specific words are used, followed by more general words, the general words are qualified by the specific words. Innumerable authorities might be quoted to sustain this position. In Bishop on Statutory Crimes, page 246, we find this:

"'Lord Bacon observed that "as exception strengthens the force of a law in cases not excepted, so enumeration weakens it in cases enumerated." This doctrine is in part the foundation of the celebrated rule that where particular words are followed by general ones, as if after the enumeration of several classes of persons or things the words are added "and all others," these general words are restricted in meaning to objects of the like kind with those specified. Therefore, under statute 29, Charles II, chapter 7, Section I, providing that no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whosoever should exercise his ordinary calling on the Lord's Day, the words "other person" were held not to include a farmer, who is not a person of the like denomination with those persons specifically mentioned. For, as Bayley, J., said: "If all persons were meant, there was no need of the specific enumeration."'

"The books are full of illustrations similar in their nature and all tending to precisely the same end.

* * * * * * *

"But, Mr. President, I am done, and I do not fail to realize that notwithstanding the opinions held by the minority of the committee, of which I am an humble member, the die in all probability is already cast, and a majority of this Senate will probably vote to admit to seats in this body the three appointees of the States respectively of Montana, Wyoming, and Washington. But let me, Mr. President, remind you and this Senate when you do this you vote to overturn the deliberate precedent established by this Senate, after full consideration, over sixty-eight years ago; you vote to reject the interpretation placed on the Constitution of the United States by such great constitutional lawyers and statesmen as Webster and Clay, as Butler and Cabot, as Ellsworth and Frelinghuysen, as Monroe and King, as Cass and Calhoun, as Douglas and Seward, as Underwood and Mason, as Badger and Bayard, as Carpenter and Conkling, as Davis and Lamar, as Garland and Eaton, as Kernan, Morgan, and James G. Blaine, of Maine.

"You establish a rule by virtue of which the great fundamental principle of the Constitution, which vests in the legislatures of States the exclusive power of choosing Senators, will be subverted. You will establish a precedent which inside of ten years will, in my judgment, result in witnessing one-third of this great body seated here by no other title than that conferred by temporary appointments of the executives of States; you will establish a precedent which will tend to demoralization in State legislatures, which will transfer the jurisdiction as to the election of United States Senators from the legislatures of the States respectively, where the Constitution has vested it, to the governors of States, and you will inflict a fatal stab at the great structure of republican government under which we live, and encourage, protect, and defend antagonisms to the best interests of the States respectively, and to the greatest and best of all the republics that has ever existed since the world began."

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Vance in opposition to the resolution that Mr. Mantle be admitted to seat as a Senator from the State of Montana. Found in the Congressional Record, vol. 25, pp. 540–542.]

"Mr. President, the question involved in this case, briefly as I can state it, is this: The term of Mr. Sanders, the late Senator from Montana, ended March 3, 1893. The legislature of that State, whose duty it was to elect his successor, by the act of 1866, adjourned on the same day without an election. On the next day, March 4, 1893, Mr. Mantle was appointed to succeed Mr. Sanders. Is he entitled to a seat in this body? In other words, the regular term of a Senator expiring on a certain day, the legislature being in session, which by law should have elected his successor, and failed to do so, shall the governor appoint? The minority on the Committee on Privileges and Elections say he shall not. The majority say he may.

* * * * * * *

"I want to say, imprimis, that I deny there is any specially imposed constitutional obligation upon us to keep the Senate full, greater or more binding than there is in regard to any other department or offices of the Government.

* * * * * * *

"If there be any duty specially imposed as to keeping the Senate full, it is imposed upon those who are charged with the creation of Senators by the Constitution, and not upon us. We sit here only to judge of the election and qualification of those who come to us claiming to be Senators; it is in no sense our duty to supply the defects and cure the failures of constitutional Senator makers to perform their sworn functions.

"Now, how are the Senators to be chosen? That is set forth in Article I, section 3, of the Constitution, as quoted above. Before applying the technical rules of construction to the words therein contained, let us look at them in a plain, commonsense light, as they would appear to any unprejudiced citizen of ordinary intelligence; and to aid us in that view, let us consider the circumstances under which this article of the Constitution was adopted.

"We may suppose that the members of that convention had assembled and organized and digested a skeleton outline of the form of government which they wished to establish. We will suppose that they had determined upon dividing its powers into three branches—the executive, legislative, and judicial; that the legislature should consist of two houses or bodies, a Senate and House of Representatives; that the Senate should consist of two Senators from each State, with one vote each. That was brief and simple. The next question arose, How should they be chosen? It was decided that they should be chosen—that is, elected—by the legislature of each State for a term of six years.

"This was the programme for establishing a complete, continuous body called the Senate of the United States, with a single exception—no provision had been made so far for the casual interruption of a term, such as death, or resignation, or expulsion, or any other change in the condition of a Senator which rendered his service impossible. Naturally, these accidental and unlooked-for circumstances were considered. The question was asked, Should any of these things happen to a senator when the legislature of his State was not in session, what then? Should that State have no representation in that body for no fault of its own?

"Surely not; and so they provided that in such a case the governor of such a State may appoint temporarily, until the legislature meets, which shall then fill the vacancy. In all these contingencies it will be observed that the legislature was treated as the primary source of power in reference to the selection of Senators; the appointing power conferred upon the governor was only in case of accident or some mischance happening to the occupant of a term once filled which would deprive the State of a representative in the Senate.

"It seems impossible to reasonably conceive that at this point there was anything else to provide for except these contingencies attending human life and the conduct of human affairs. They had already provided for the election of the first Senators, fixed their terms, and how and when in regular course their successors should be chosen; and it is a reflection upon their intelligence to say that they in the same breath added a clause giving the governor power to fill these identical vacancies without even the averment that the legislature had failed or refused to do its duty. To make sure they gave a sample of the kind of vacancy which might 'happen.'

"There was death—no member doubted that was something which might happen to a Senator, and therefore need not be named. There was expulsion, which might also happen to a Senator—there was no doubt about that; but there was a doubt whether a Senator could resign his office on account of the doctrine which governed the British Parliament. To establish the contrary doctrine they mentioned 'resignation' as one of the vacancies which might 'happen,' and added the words 'or otherwise' to include other contingencies, as death, expulsion, and the like, not needed to be named.

"Surely, in the face of their express provisions for filling regular terms by the legislature, if they had intended to include the filling of such terms in the powers granted to the governors, they would have said so in plainer terms than the words 'or otherwise,' and would not have left so important a grant of power to depend upon a construction, and a doubtful construction at that, and one in the face of the ordinary meaning of the words used and of well-established law. Nor can the plea of ignorance of the meaning of these words, or the usage of the law in the construction of them, be for a moment considered.

"The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Hunton] says technical rules ought not to be applied in construing the language of those who framed the Constitution, because many of them were not lawyers. If this be true, it is also true that many of them were lawyers, and as eminent as any in America. Mr. Madison himself was a member of the Committee on Style or Revision, and, we may assume, carefully scrutinized and corrected the language of the clauses as they were adopted. As they put it, it seems to me language could not be plainer.

"If they had intended that the words 'or otherwise' should include every possible vacancy, they would not have used the words, 'which happened by resignation or otherwise' at all, but would have simply said, 'if vacancies occur' the governor shall appoint, etc. Nor would they have used the word 'happen' as applied to a vacancy created by law on a given day, which had no element of chance about it; nor would they have used the word 'if' vacancies happen, because a regular term was sure to expire on a certain day, and create a vacancy. There was no contingency about it as is implied by 'if.' They would have simply said 'when' vacancies occur. As one would not say, 'If the sun rises to-morrow I will do so,' but, 'When the sun rises to-morrow I will do so.'

* * * * * * *

"I can not better close my remarks on this head than by quoting from the speech of George E. Badger, of North Carolina, delivered in the Phelps case in 1854. He was, perhaps, the greatest lawyer my State has produced, and was possessed of an intellect as profound as that of Bacon, analytic as that of Fearne, and acute as that of Pascal:

"'The vacancies which the executive is authorized to fill are never vacancies which happen by the efflux of time. They are not foreseen vacancies; they are vacancies that happen by resignation or otherwise. Mr. President, from an exceeding desire to give this clause of the Constitution such a construction as would keep the Senate always full, I labored hard a year or two ago, when we had questions of this kind before us, to find out some method of supporting in my own mind a construction that a vacancy happening by efflux of time, and not filled beforehand by the legislature, might be brought within this limited power conferred on the executive.

"'But, sir, I have been obliged to abandon it. "By resignation or otherwise," is the language. We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies; but it can not be applied to the expiration of a term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion, therefore, is that the governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which the Senator was elected—in other words, at the termination of his term in the Senate. It must be a vacancy in the term happening during the recess of the legislature; it must be a vacancy in the term happening by resignation or other casualty. That I understand to have been the express and solemn decision of the Senate in Lanman's case in 1825, overruling one or two earlier decisions which had passed, perhaps, without full consideration.'

"The danger of the inconvenience supposed to arise from the Senate not being 'always full' is not to be compared for a moment with the danger which would ensue if the practice were followed of filling the Senate with members who are not entitled by the prescriptions of the Constitution to sit here. Into this temple of our liberties no man should be permitted to enter except by the door of the Constitution.

"Doubtless, when providing the way by which it might be entered, our fathers had in mind the divine Wisdom, which saith:

"'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. But he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep.'

"There should be no politics in the decision of this question. No other consideration should enter into it but that of a sincere desire to maintain the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. Doubtless many of the complicated decisions which this body has made have arisen from the pressure of temporary circumstances of one kind or another. It is a great question which should be decided with proper solemnity. The ambition of men which leads them often to the obstruction of the proper and legal election of Senators to this body in the hope of securing favor from a single man—the executive—should be rebuked, and they should be taught to know that this great tribunal will not make itself an accomplice in their schemes and combinations, if we wish to avoid scandals and to preserve the character and dignity of the United States Senate."

[Remarks of Mr. Hoar in support of the resolution that Mr. Mantle be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Montana. Found in the Congressional Record, vol. 25, pp. 687, 688.]

"Mr. President, this seems to me as simple and plain a question as ever was confused by metaphysics or clouded by legal argument. The Constitution of the United States says that when there is a vacancy in this body by death, resignation, or otherwise——

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. "It does not say that. The word 'death' is not in the Constitution."

Mr. HOAR. "Well, 'resignation or otherwise,' then. It may be filled when caused by resignation or otherwise. As my friend says, 'death' is not mentioned; and if the word 'otherwise' means 'in the same way as resignation,' you can not fill the vacancy when a Senator dies, according to his suggestion.

"Mr. President, one of two things is true; either when the framers of the Constitution said 'otherwise' they meant 'in any other way,' and intended to provide for all kinds of vacancy; or the framers of the Constitution meant to provide that there should be certain cases, naturally to be expected, easy to be foreseen, impossible not to have been thought of by them, in which the States should not be equally represented in the Senate.

"Will anybody doubt that those circumspect and wise and experienced men knew very well that State legislatures, bodies who, if their two branches acted separately, were to record the action of two artificial beings who were very likely to differ, and if they acted as they have done since 1866, in joint convention, were to be composed of a number of men who might be divided into three or four parties, and so could not agree—is there a member of the Senate who will stand up here and say that he doubts seriously that the framers of the Constitution did not mean to anticipate and provide for that condition of things?

"If they did mean to provide for it, is there a man bold enough to justify his vote on this question by announcing that he believes in that case our fathers did not mean to have the Senate filled? They provided that ninety-nine one-hundredths of the American people could not for ninety-nine hundred or ninety-nine thousand years, if this nation should endure so long, under any conceivable circumstance or for any conceivable reason, have two Senators for forty-three States and the forty-fourth State have but one. The one constitutional impossibility, so far as the wit of man could devise, and the power of a national constitution could enact, was that when this Senate was to act on the important questions affecting the rights of the States and the people two voices should answer for each.

"Now, that is the whole of it; and when there is a vacancy by resignation or 'otherwise,' a word comprehending every possible or conceivable case, the governor, if the legislature has not done it, is to appoint. Upon the meaning of the word 'otherwise' and upon the truth of these two simple propositions this whole debate has, in fact, turned. There have been winding and turning and searching of precedents and splitting of hairs; but when any Senator objecting to the admission of Mr. Mantle is asked: Do you admit that the decision in the New Hampshire case was right? he is obliged to answer as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] answered, 'I voted for it because I thought it would be a hard case, but I have now concluded it was wrong.' This is the substance of what the Senator says.

"Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut and, I think, one other Senator sought to convict me of an inconsistency because when in the middle of the debate, the question not being before the Senate, when we were discussing something else (as he thinks, when we were discussing the New Hampshire case), Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, asked me if I claimed or thought that if the legislature met and separated the governor could then appoint. It was such a case as every lawyer in this body is familiar with. Somebody comes up to you when your head is full of something else, in the street or in the town meeting, and says: 'Squire, how would it be, supposin'?' I never heard of the lawyer who admitted that the opinions he gave under such circumstances were of much value. Almost as soon as I took my seat after that speech, on reflection, I came to the conclusion that I had made an erroneous answer, and I have acted on another principle in the Senate ever since.

"If my honorable thinks that I am to be held in law, or in morals, or in consistency, or in responsibility to public opinion by the answer which I gave to that shrewd question put by that shrewd gentleman at that time, what is his condition, who comes in here to take back four solemn votes of his own on cases before the Senate and in issue—the Bell case, the Blair case, the Marston case, and the Pasco case, two of them cast after the most deliberate and solemn debate—a debate participated in by the great constitutional lawyers of the country?

"Mr. President, if there were nothing else in this case but these four great and recent precedents, I should argue both to the understanding and the conscience of the members of this body to stand by them. No court, no legislative body, no tribunal can maintain the respect of the people long that does not maintain its own consistency and that does not regard its own solemn judgments.

"He and I struggled for half a winter to maintain that principle in the case of Mr. Kellogg, of Louisiana, against the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, angered, possessed with the feeling that Mr. Kellogg had been improperly admitted; and when the majority changed and the Democrats came in, they still held (and held fast, under the lead of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Gordon], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Hampton], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Bayard], now in honorable service abroad, and the great jurist from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar], who recently went to his reward to the grief of all his countrymen North and South) to the doctrine of sustaining the deliberate judgments of the Senate.

"My honorable friend from Connecticut speculates about the possibility of a legislature being influenced by corrupt reasons and refusing to elect a member of this body in order that the governor may appoint some ambitious person who is in league with him, and he thinks there may be a very bad result from our adhering to the solemn judgments of the Senate on that account. I should like to know what possibility of corrupt influence bringing popular liberty and republican government itself into discredit can be greater than the influence which, if this disregard of our precedents is established as a policy, will be brought to bear on the members of this body to seat or unseat men who have a rightful title to seats here according as they expect they will vote one way or the other on some exciting question pending.

"I think that the attitude of my honorable friend from Connecticut, who has voted four times for this doctrine and now seeks to reverse it (honest as every man who knows him knows everything he does and thinks is honest), is still an attitude more fraught with a graver public danger than any he has suggested as flowing from one or the other exposition of the Constitution in this matter. My honorable friend says that, although he thinks the New Hampshire cases were wrong, still there is a distinction between those cases and the one before the Senate.

"Mr. PLATT. I have not said that I thought the New Hampshire cases were wrong.

"Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator whether he thought it was a sound constitutional decision, and he said, no.

"Mr. PLATT. I understood the Senator's question to be on the point as to whether, if the case was admitted to be decided on the question that a governor could appoint at the commencement of a term, I thought it was wrong.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator thought it was wrong.

"Mr. PLATT. I did not say that.

"Mr. HOAR. The Senator said he did not think it was right on any ground; but, if he thinks so, on what ground?

"Mr. PLATT. I do.

"Mr. HOAR. On what ground?

"Mr. PLATT. On the ground that the State of New Hampshire had not had an opportunity to make the election.

"Mr. HOAR. Now, just let us look at that a moment and see where the true principle comes in. The Senator says if a State legislature has tried its best to make an election, as in the case of Montana, where the legislature met and balloted at the time fixed, and balloted day after day and week after week, and failed because the members of that legislature could not find a man on whom a majority could conscientiously agree, an inability which to every just and honest man is absolute in the conduct of the affairs of life, he will keep the man out; but when the whole people of a State deliberately put it into their constitution that their legislature shall not meet at the proper time and shall not elect at the proper time, so that not only has there been no attempt on the part of the legislature to do its duty, but the people say that the legislature shall not try to do its constitutional and lawful duty, then in such case my honorable friend from Connecticut says of course he will let the man in.

"The Constitution then, according to my honorable friend from Connecticut, is this: When the framers of the Constitution, Oliver Ellsworth, James Madison and their associates, said if there is a vacancy 'by resignation or otherwise,' they did not mean in any other way but in the same way as resignation, if any other same way could be conceived of; that they intended that in a certain easily to be foreseen condition there should be vacancies in this body, and then further they provided that if a State legislature tried its best to elect and could not, the governor should not have any power to appoint and the State should go unrepresentated, but if the people of a State put it into their constitution that the legislature should not even try to elect a Senator, then it is such a hard case that the man ought to be admitted.

"Mr. President, that is the whole of it. You may discuss and refine and bring into this matter the subtlety of dialetics and split hairs, if when the framers of the Constitution said, 'resignation or otherwise,' they meant 'resignation or any other conceivable case,' then this case belongs to Mr. Mantle. If they meant to narrow the provision to the case of a vacancy by resignation or something like it, to the case of the abandonment of his post for a good or evil reason by the Senator, and in the great field of other possibilities, and intended that the State should lose its equality and its sovereignty, and that it should not be represented here, then the case is not with Mr. Mantle.

"If the words, 'happen by resignation or otherwise,' include the case at the beginning of a term where the State has sent nobody here and it was impossible to send anybody here, then this case belongs to Mr. Mantle upon the precedents; but if it be sound doctrine that it is a hard case and the State shall be excused and the governor shall appoint when it does not try, and the people say the legislature shall not try to elect its Senators, then the case is not with Mr. Mantle upon our precedents. If the case be that upon precedent, upon principle, upon authority, the people of these three States have a right to have their constitutional voice uttered, then for one—other gentlemen will do as they please—I should feel myself degraded and man-sworn if I voted to keep them out because I do not like the votes they are expected to give."

WEDNESDAY, August 23, 1893.

Mr. Vance offered the following substitute for the resolution submitted by the committee:

"Resolved, That Hon. Lee Mantle is not entitled to a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Montana."

The question of agreeing to the substitute offered by Mr. Vance being submitted to the Senate, the same was agreed to by the following vote:

Yeas—Messrs. Berry, Blackburn, Caffery, Coke, Cullom, Dixon, Faulkner, Gallin-ger, George, Gibson, Gray, Harris, Kyle, Lindsay, McMillan, McPherson, Manderson, Mills, Mitchell (Oregon), Mitchell (Wisconsin), Murphy, Palmer, Pasco, Peffer, Platt, Proctor, Ransom, Smith, Stockbridge, Vance, Vest, Vilas, Washburn, White (California), White (Louisiana)—35.

Nays—Messrs. Bate, Butler, Cameron, Carey, Daniel, Davis, Dubois, Frye, Hansbrough, Hawley, Higgins, Hill, Hoar, Hunton, Irby, Jones (Arkansas), Jones (Nevada), Lodge, Martin, Perkins, Power, Pugh, Roach, Shoup, Squire, Stewart, Teller, Turpie, Walthall, and Wolcott—30.

(Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pp. 688, 689.)

Mr. Manderson moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was agreed to. Mr. Vance moved to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to reconsider was laid before the Senate August 24, 1893 (Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pp. 782, 783), and August 28, 1893 (Ibid., pp. 989, 994, 995).

The motion to reconsider the vote by which the substitute offered by Mr. Vance was agreed to, was laid on the table by the following vote:

Yeas—Messrs. Berry, Caffery, Call, Camden, Coke, Cullom, Dixon, Faulkner, Gallinger, George, Gray, Lindsay, McMillan, McPherson, Mills, Mitchell (Wisconsin), Murphy, Palmer, Pasco, Platt, Proctor, Ransom, Smith, Stockbridge, Vance, Vest, Vilas, Voorhees, Washburn, White (California), and White (Louisiana)—31.

The resolution as amended, as follows—

was then adopted by the following vote:

Yeas—Messrs. Aldrich, Berry, Caffery, Call, Camden, Coke, Cullom, Dixon, Faulkner, Gallinger, George, Gray, Lindsay, McMillan, McPherson, Mills, Mitchell (Wisconsin), Murphy, Palmer, Pasco, Platt, Proctor, Ransom, Smith, Stockbridge, Vance, Vest, Vilas, Voorhees, Washburn, White (California), and White (Louisiana)—32.

Nays—Messrs. Bate, Butler, Cameron, Davis, Dubois, Frye, Hansbrough, Hawley, Higgins, Hill, Hunter, Irby, Jones (Arkansas), Jones (Nevada), Martin, Morgan, Peffer, Perkins, Pettigrew, Power, Pugh, Roach, Sherman, Shoup, Squire, Stewart, Teller, Walthall, and Wolcott—29.

WEDNESDAY, August 30, 1893.

Mr. Pugh submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

"Resolved, That there be allowed out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Lee Mantle, the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for all his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Montana."

WEDNESDAY, September 6, 1893.

Mr. Vance, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred a resolution providing for compensation for Lee Mantle for his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the United States Senate from Montana, report that he be allowed $2,500."

Which report was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

THURSDAY, September 7, 1893.

The foregoing resolution, providing for compensation to Lee Mantle for his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Montana, was favorably reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and laid over for the day.

TUESDAY, September 19, 1893.

On motion of Mr. Vance, the resolution allowing compensation to Lee Mantle was taken up and read, as follows:

"Resolved, That there be allowed out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Lee Mantle the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for all his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Montana."

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment in line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ASAHEL C. BECKWITH, of Wyoming.

The term of Francis E. Warren, Senator from the State of Wyoming, expired on the 3d day of March, 1893. The legislature of said State which was in session next preceding the expiration of the term of said Francis E. Warren adjourned without an election. March 9, 1893, the governor of the State of Wyoming appointed Asahel C. Beckwith to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of Mr. Warren. On the 15th day of March, 1893, the credentials of Mr. Beckwith were presented and ordered to lie on the table pending the appointment of a Committee on Privileges and Elections, and were afterwards referred to such committee. March 27, 1893, the Committee on Privileges and Elections made a report affirming the right of Mr. Beckwith to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Wyoming. The report was not adopted, the question in the case being substantially the same as in the case of Lee Mantle, supra, and as in the case of John B. Allen, post. Under date of July 11, 1893, Mr. Beckwith sent to the Senate a communication stating that he had resigned his appointment as Senator from the State of Wyoming.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings in the Senate, as published in the Congressional Record, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the communication from Mr. Beckwith stating the fact of his resignation.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1893.

Mr. Vance presented the credentials of Hon. Asahel C. Beckwith, appointed a Senator from the State of Wyoming. He asked that the credentials be read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections when appointed, and that meanwhile they lie on the table.

The credentials were read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

"STATE OF WYOMING, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

"To all persons to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Know ye, that the executive of said State hereby appoints Asahel C. Beckwith, a duly qualified citizen of said State and an inhabitant thereof, a Senator from the said State of Wyoming, to fill the vacancy happening in the Senate of the United States by the expiration of the term of Francis E. Warren on the 3d day of March, in the year of our Lord 1893, during the recess of the legislature of said State, and by the nonelection of said Francis E. Warren's successor.

"To have and to hold the said office of Senator of the United States until the next meeting of the legislature of said State.

"In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the great seal of the State to be hereunto affixed.

"Given under my hand at the city of Cheyenne on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1893.

"By the governor:

"AMOS W. BARBER, Secretary of State."

MONDAY, March 27, 1893.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the claim of Asahel C. Beckwith to be admitted to a seat in the Senate from the State of Wyoming, submitted a report, accompanied by a resolution, which resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That Asahel C. Beckwith is entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Wyoming."

On motion of Mr. Hoar the report and the accompanying resolution were ordered to lie on the table.

(Cong. Rec., vol. 25, p. 33.)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Vance (chairman), Gray, Pugh, Turpie, Palmer, Hoar, Mitchell of Oregon, Chandler, and Higgins.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 27, 1893.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Asahel C. Beckwith, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Wyoming, respectfully report:

The term of Mr. Warren, Senator from Wyoming, ended March 3, 1893. The legislature of said State, who were, under Revised Statutes, sections 14, 15, entitled to elect his successor on the —— day of ———, 1893, adjourned without an election. Thereupon the governor of Wyoming, on the 9th day of March, 1893, appointed Mr. Beckwith to hold the office of Senator until the next meeting of the legislature.

We think said appointment valid for the reasons set forth in the report in the case of Mr. Mantle, claiming a seat from the State of Montana.

We recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution:

"Resolved, That Asahel C. Beckwith is entitled to be admitted to a seat as Senator from the State of Wyoming."

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, August 7, 1893.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the following communication, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

"[The Beckwith Commercial Company, merchants. Incorporated 1887.]

"EVANSTON, WYO., July 11, 1893.

"DEAR SIR: Owing to a combination of circumstances over which I had no control, I have been obliged to hand in my resignation to Governor Osborne of my appointment as United States Senator from Wyoming.

"I beg to remain, your obedient servant,

"A. C. BECKWITH.

"Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, Washington, D. C."

WEDNESDAY, September 6, 1893.

The Secretary read the following resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

"Resolved, That there be allowed out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to A. C. Beckwith, the sum of $2,000, in full compensation for all his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat as Senator from the State of Wyoming."

The resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

TUESDAY, September 19, 1893.

The Secretary read the following resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 6th instant:

"Resolved, That there be allowed out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to A. C. Beckwith, the sum of $2,000, in full compensation for all his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat as a Senator from the State of Wyoming."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment was proposed to this resolution by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Carey], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, before the word "dollars," strike out "two thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred."

After debate, the amendment was rejected and the resolution was agreed to.

(Cong. Rec. vol. 25, pp. 1568 and 1569.)

JOHN B. ALLEN, of Washington.

The term of John B. Allen, Senator from the State of Washington, expired March 3, 1893. The legislature of said State assembled January 9, 1893, and finally adjourned March 9, 1893, without electing a Senator to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of said John B. Allen. On the 10th day of March, 1893, the governor of the State of Washington appointed said John B. Allen to fill the vacancy occasioned as aforesaid. March 20, 1893, the credentials of Mr. Allen were presented in the Senate of the United States and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On the 27th day of March, 1893, the committee submitted a report in the case, accompanied by a resolution that Mr. Allen be admitted to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Washington. On the 28th day of August, 1893, an amendment to this resolution was proposed, declaring that Mr. Allen was not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Washington. The amendment was adopted August 28, 1893, by a vote of 32 yeas to 29 nays, and the resolution as amended, that Mr. Allen was not entitled to a seat as a Senator from the State of Washington, was agreed to without a division. This action was taken immediately after the vote was taken in the Senate on the admission of Lee Mantle, and was evidently based on the same ground as the action of the Senate in that case.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings in the Senate in relation thereto as published in the Congressional Record, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the vote on the motion to amend the resolution reported by the committee, and a statement of the result of the vote on the resolution as amended.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MONDAY, March 20, 1893.

Mr. Squire presented the credentials of John B. Allen, appointed by the governor of Washington a Senator from that State, which were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

"STATE OF WASHINGTON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

"To the President of the Senate of the United States, and to all to whom these presents may come, greeting:

"Whereas the term of office of Hon. John B. Allen as a Senator in Congress from the State of Washington expired March 3, A. D. 1893; and

"Whereas the legislature of the State, which assembled January 9, A. D. 1893, finally adjourned March 9, A. D. 1893 without electing a Senator in Congress from said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of Senator Allen; and

"Whereas by reason of the premises a vacancy exists and happens, during the recess of the legislature, in the office of Senator in Congress from the State of Washington:

"Now, therefore, I, J. H. McGraw, executive of the State of Washington, by reason of the premises, and by virtue of the authority in me vested as such executive by the Constitution of the United States, do hereby appoint said John B. Allen, a native-born citizen of the United States over the age of 30 years and an inhabitant of the State, a Senator in Congress from the State of Washington to fill such vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature of the State.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State of Washington to be affixed hereto, at Olympia, this 10th day of March, A. D. 1893, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and seventeenth.

J. H. McGRAW.

"[SEAL.]

"By the governor:

"J. H. PRICE, Secretary of State."

MONDAY, March 27, 1893.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of John B. Allen, appointed a Senator from the State of Washington, submitted a report accompanied by a resolution. The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That John B. Allen is entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Washington."

The report with the accompanying resolution were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of the same Senators named in the statement preceding the report in the case of Lee Mantle and in the case of Asahel C. Beckwith, supra.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 27, 1893.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report to accompany Senate resolution relative to admitting John B. Allen to a seat as a Senator:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of John B. Allen, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Washington, respectfully report:

The term of Mr. Allen, Senator from Washington, ended March 3, 1893. The legislature of said State, who were, under Revised Statutes, sections 14, 15, entitled to elect his successor, on the 9th day of March, 1893, adjourned without an election. Thereupon the governor of Washington, on the 10th day of March, 1893, appointed Mr. Allen to hold the office of Senator until the next meeting of the legislature.

We think said appointment valid for the reasons set forth in the report in the case of Mr. Mantle, claiming a seat from the State of Montana.

We recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution.

"Resolved, That John B. Allen is entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Washington."

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, August 28, 1893.

Mr. VANCE. The case from the State of Washington is pending, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate to take it up, I ask that it be now voted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. Hoar from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, March 27, 1893, as follows:

"Resolved, That John B. Allen is entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Washington."

Mr. VANCE. I suppose the result can be reached, not by offering a substitute, but by taking a direct vote on the report. ["No," "No."]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the committee.

Mr. VANCE. In deference to those who prefer to follow the precedent, I move to amend by inserting the word "not."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "is," in the first line of the resolution, insert the word "not," so as to read:

"Resolved, That John B. Allen is not entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Washington."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Vance].

The vote on the amendment resulted as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Aldrich, Berry, Caffery, Call, Camden, Coke, Cullom, Dixon, Faulkner, Gallinger, George, Gray, Lindsay, McMillan, McPherson, Mills, Mitchell (Wis.), Murphy, Palmer, Pasco, Platt, Proctor, Ransom, Smith, Stockbridge, Vance, Vest, Vilas, Voorhees, Washburn, White (Cal.), and White (La.)—32.

Nays—Messrs. Bate, Butler, Cameron, Davis, Dubois, Frye, Hansbrough, Hawley, Higgins, Hill, Hunton, Irby, Jones (Ark.), Jones (Nev.), Martin, Morgan, Peffer, Perkins, Pettigrew, Power, Pugh, Roach, Sherman, Shoup, Squire, Stewart, Teller, Walthall, Wolcott—29.

So the amendment was agreed to and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, August 30, 1893.

Mr. Squire submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

"Resolved, That there be allowed out of the contingent fund of the Senate to John B. Allen the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for all his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Washington."

WEDNESDAY, September 6, 1893.

Mr. Vance, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report, which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The report was as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the resolution providing compensation for John B. Allen for his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the United States Senate from Washington, report that he be allowed $2,500.

TUESDAY, September 19, 1893.

The Secretary read the following resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 6th instant:

"Resolved, That there be allowed out of the contingent fund of the Senate to John B. Allen the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for all his time and expense in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Washington."

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment, in line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

After the vote in the Senate in the cases of Lee Mantle and John B. Allen, and on the 26th day of September, 1893, Mr. Dubois submitted the following resolution; which was read and ordered to be printed and to lie over until the following day:

"Whereas several sovereign States are without full representation in the Senate, which they are entitled to: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the consideration of legislation relating to the Federal election laws, tariff, and finance, matters which materially affect the partially unrepresented States, be postponed in the Senate until Monday, the 15th day of January, 1894, to enable the States of Washington, Montana, and Wyoming to have the votes, influence, and protection in the Senate which are guaranteed to each sovereign State by the Constitution of the United States."

(Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pp. 1776, 1777.)

On Wednesday, September 27, 1893, the foregoing resolution was laid before the Senate and debated, but no vote was taken thereon.

(Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pp. 1828–1838.)

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Dubois in support of the resolution introduced by him that the consideration of legislation relating to the Federal election laws, tariff, and finance be postponed in the Senate until Monday, the 15th day of January, 1894. "Mr. President, it seems to me that this resolution is very appropriate and germane at this time. It is worthy the most serious consideration of the Senate. Here are three States deprived of their importance and strength when matters of weighty moment to them are being discussed, preparatory to being decided upon. It is no fault of the people of these States that they are not fully represented here. It is their misfortune, which you can cure.

"In two of the three States there were three political parties represented in the legislature in such proportions that neither party had a majority, and, in consequence, an election should not have been had. In the other, one party had a majority, but individual ambitions and animosities prevented an election. It is quite likely that a strong belief that the governor had the power to appoint a Senator temporarily in case the legislature failed to elect may have influenced some legislators.

"It was not the intention of the people of these States that they should have but one Senator here. The great interests which these communities have in the pending and contemplated legislation precludes such an idea. Scarcely any States are more concerned about tariff legislation than Washington and Wyoming, while both have even greater interest in any legislation relating to financial matters. The very life-blood itself of Montana is in its mines, while it will also be directly affected by any tariff laws which may be passed.

"This Senate decided that, under the conditions which existed, the appointees of the governors of these three States were not entitled to seats in the Sena . I do not wish nor intend to criticise that decision. You will recall, however, that a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections voted in favor of seating the governors' appointees, and that the Senate rejected them by a bare majority of three, obtained with great difficulty.

"The report of the majority of the committee was submitted by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar], who also supported the report in remarks of great clearness and strength.

* * * * * * *

"The majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections submitted their report through the Senator from Massachusetts and say:

"'We think said appointment valid.

"'The provisions of the Constitution, under which this question arises, are as follows (Art. I, sec. 3):

"'"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote."

"'What is the great and leading purpose which the provisions now under consideration was designed to accomplish? It is that the Senate of the United States shall be full, always full. Each State was to be represented there by two Senators. No State was ever to be deprived of its equal vote in the Senate, except by its own consent to a change in the Constitution itself.'

"The report says further:

"'The equality of the State representation in the Senate, which can only be secured by keeping both seats full, is of first importance. But the presence of two Senators instead of one is a consideration of very great importance indeed. There are a few members of that body whose party feeling would carry them so far as to induce them to prefer the absence of a colleague to the presence of one of opposite political faith. There are a thousand occasions when the power of consulting with an associate devoted to the interests of the same community, and conversant with its wishes, is of inestimable importance.'

* * * * * * *

"I will further say that, every Senator agreeing that the Constitution intended that each State should be represented by two Senators at all times, I submit in all candor that we should postpone the consideration of questions of such great importance to these partially represented States as are now pending until they have an opportunity to be fully represented.

"If the statement should be made that there is no measure before the Senate to change the Federal election laws or remodel the tariff, the answer is that it is well known that the question of changing the election laws is now being debated in the other House, and that in all probability the measure will reach the Senate long before the bill which is being discussed here relating to finance is brought to a vote. It is also well known that tariff hearings are being had before the Ways and Means Committee of the other House, as a preliminary to the framing and passing of a new tariff bill.

"If it be urged that the legislatures of these States will not be called together or if called together will not elect, the answer is that the Senate of the United State will have done its patriotic duty in endeavoring to preserve the rights guaranteed to those States by the Constitution. I have no reasonable doubt myself that the governor and legislatures of these States will lay aside every other consideration save that of duty to their respective States and have their full quota of Senators here at the appointed time if you pass the resolution which I have proposed.

"The legislatures have not been called together, it is true, but that is easily accounted for. There is a widespread opinion throughout those States, reflected in their newspapers, that the unseating of the applicants from those States was part of a plan to deprive them of a portion of their representation and then force measures through here inimical to their interests. I do not subscribe to those views; I repudiate them; but that is the prevalent opinion throughout that section of the country; and in consequence of that the legislatures of those States have not been called, in addition, of course, to the fact that it will be difficult to elect under the conditions which exist in the legislatures.

"I will close by saying that our forefathers constructed the Constitution on broad and patriotic principles, having always in view the rights of individuals and States, and we should be imbued with the same spirit in interpreting the Constitution. It were better than this legislation should fail than that we should be open to the suspicion of having used the power of numbers to wrong three sovereign States."

[Fifty-fifth Congress—First and second sessions.]

HENRY W. CORBETT, of Oregon.

The term of John H. Mitchell as a Senator from the State of Oregon expired March 3, 1897. Under the constitution and laws of the State of Oregon, the legislature of said State convened January 11, 1897. On that day the senate, constituting one branch of such legislature, met and effected a permanent organization. The house, constituting the other branch of said legislature, met on the same day and effected a temporary organization, and at a later day attempted a permanent organization, but its validity was in dispute and the house as thus organized was not recognized by the coordinate branch of the legislature—the senate—nor by the executive branch of the government of the State.

During the last week of February, 1897, both branches of the legislature dispersed and the members returned to their homes without having transacted any business of a legislative character. There was no election of a United States Senator by concurrent vote. What was claimed to be a lawful joint assembly was held; but that joint assembly did not elect a Senator and adjourned without day on the 24th day of February, 1897.

On the 6th day of March, 1897, Henry W. Corbett was appointed by the governor of the State of Oregon United States Senator to fill the place made vacant by the expiration of the term of Hon. John H. Mitchell.

The credentials of Mr. Corbett were presented in the Senate on the 15th day of March, 1897, and were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On the 19th day of March, 1897, a statement signed by the governor and the secretary of state of the State of Oregon was presented in the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On the 26th day of January, 1898, the committee submitted a report accompanied by a resolution that Mr. Corbett was not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Oregon. A majority of the committee were of the opinion that under the decisions of the Senate in several like cases, the case of Mr. Corbett called for the application of the rule of stare decisis, the point in the case being "whether the executive of a State can appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy caused by the expiration of the regular term of a Senator when the legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the term fails to elect a Senator to fill such vacancy."

A minority of the committee were of the opinion that the appointment of Mr. Corbett was legal and entitled him to a seat in the Senate.

After the question of the right of Mr. Corbett to a seat in the Senate had been thoroughly debated, the resolution reported by the committee was adopted by a vote of 50 yeas to 19 nays.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings in the Senate in such case as published in the Congressional Record, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the views of the minority of the committee, a statement of the days on which the question was debated in the Senate, with a reference to the record of the same as published in the Congressional Record, extracts from the remarks of certain Senators in such debate, the vote on the amendment offered to the resolution submitted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the vote on the resolution declaring Mr. Corbett not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Oregon.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1897.

Mr. McBride presented the credentials of Henry W. Corbett, appointed by the governor of Oregon a Senator from that State.

The credentials were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

(Cong. Rec., vol. 30, pp. 11, 12.)

FRIDAY, March 19, 1897.

Mr. Chandler presented a statement signed by the governor and secretary of state of Oregon, which was read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

TUESDAY, March 30, 1897.

Mr. McBride presented a certificate from the governor of Oregon, amending the credentials of Henry W. Corbett, appointed a Senator from that State. The amended credentials were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

JANUARY 26, 1898.

Mr. Caffery presented the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the matter of the claim of Henry W. Corbett to a seat in the Senate as Senator from the State of Oregon. The report was received and ordered printed in the Record.

Subsequently Mr. Hoar presented the views of the minority of the committee, which were ordered printed in connection with the report of the committee.

(Cong. Rec., vol. 31, pp. 1017, 1018.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

Report (to accompany Senate Res. No. 253):

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Henry W. Corbett, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Oregon, respectfully report:

The term of Hon. John H. Mitchell, Senator from Oregon, ended March 3, 1897. The nineteenth biennial session of the legislature of Oregon, under the constitution and laws of that State, was to convene at the capital on the 11th of January, 1897. On that day the senate met and effected a permanent organization. The house met on the same day, effected a temporary organization, and at a later day effected a permanent organization. There was no recognition of the house by the executive branch of the government, or by the coordinate branch of the legislature, the senate.

The members of the senate and house dispersed and returned to their homes without having transacted any business of a legislative character. It thus appears that the legislature of Oregon deliberately refused to perform any of the functions with which they were charged, one of the most important being the election of a Senator to succeed John H. Mitchell.

We are of the opinion that a series of decisions by this body on the point involved in this case forms the rule of stare decisis.

The point of the case of Mr. Corbett is whether the executive of a State can appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy caused by the expiration of the regular term of a senator when the legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the term fails to elect a Senator to fill such vacancy.

In the Lee Mantle case, decided by this body in 1893, the legislature of Montana adjourned the day before the vacancy occurred by the expiration of the term of Mr. Sanders, after having ineffectually balloted to elect his successor.

In the case of Mr. Corbett the legislature did not even make the attempt to elect. In the case of Mr. Mantle the legislature made the attempt and failed.

Your committee are of the opinion that there is no essential difference between the two cases. In both cases opportunity was afforded to the respective legislatures to perform their constitutional duty. They did not perform that duty. Whether because of failure to organize, as is alleged, but not substantiated, or because after organizing they failed to agree on a choice, does not affect the fact that opportunity was given in both cases to elect, of which they did not avail themselves.

The case of Kensey Johns, of Delaware, decided in 1794; of James Lanman, of Connecticut, decided in 1825; and of Lee Mantle, of Montana, decided in 1893, are on all fours with the case of Mr. Corbett. They were decided after full presentation and exhaustive argument. They decide that an executive appointment can not be made when the legislature had opportunity to elect and failed to elect.

There is no precedent of any weight against the authority of these cases. There have been appointments by governors when the legislature had not the opportunity to elect, and when the apparent hardship of depriving the State of a Senator operated to their admission, but your committee do not think that they have any weight in the solution of the question presented by this case.

Going outside of precedent, and interpreting the Constitution according to the accepted rule that the primary meaning of words is to be followed when there is nothing in the context to show that a secondary meaning is intended, and that general words take on the meaning of the special words, we are of the opinion that the "vacancies" mentioned in article 1, section 3, of the Constitution are those occurring in like manner as "resignation," i. e., by fortuitous event.

We are of the opinion that it would be a dangerous usurpation of power for a governor to appoint to fill a vacancy occurring by the expiration of a regular term in this body; one not sanctioned by the Constitution, and not supported by controlling precedent or convincing reason.

We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Henry W. Corbett is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Oregon."

D. CAFFERY.
WM. V. ALLEN.
J. C. BURROWS.

I concur in the conclusion of the majority of the committee, and submit herewith my opinion.

E. W. PETTUS.

IN THE MATTER OF MR. HENRY W. CORBETT'S CLAIM TO A SEAT AS SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OREGON.

I prefer to put my concurrence in the conclusion of the majority of the committee squarely and entirely on the ground that the question of law involved in this case was settled in the Mantle case, and ought to remain settled forever.

In the great debate in the Mantle case, which extended at intervals from March to August, 1893, the senior Senator from Massachusetts said:

"I am gratified that this question now arises under circumstances where it can be settled without any thought or imputation of partisanship upon any Senator delivering his judgment; because, although it happens there are two Republicans and one Democrat affected by these reports, there is a Senator in this body who took his seat on the 4th of March without question, whose title depends upon virtually the same thing." (25 Cong. Rec., pt. 1, p. 43.)

And in the same debate the then junior Senator from Indiana, in the same line of conservative wisdom, said:

"It would be perhaps as fair a way as any to treat this as a case of first instance, the same as if no decision had been made upon it, and to remit the present court, the members of this body sitting in judgment, to the text of the Constitution itself, to the letter of the passage relating to the appointing power, and the spirit of the context in which it is found, and the tenor and purpose of the whole instrument." (Ib., 68.)

The courts of England for centuries and the United States for one century declared it far better that the law should be settled and known than that it should be decided with technical accuracy. Those who have studied the judicial legislation enacted during the last forty years, the overthrow of principles long deemed settled, will appreciate the wisdom of the maxim, Stare decisis.

I think the question in this case was settled in the Mantle case, and should remain settled.

E. W. PETTUS.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned respectfully dissent from the opinion of the majority, and briefly state their reasons.

The term of John H. Mitchell, Senator from the State of Oregon, expired at noon on the 4th day of March, 1897. The members of the legislature who were entitled to elect a successor assembled on the 11th day of January, 1897. The senate completed a lawful permanent organization. That day the house attempted such an organization, but its validity was in dispute and for a time there were two bodies, each claiming to be the lawful house. There was never any election of a Senator by concurrent vote. What was claimed to be a lawful joint assembly was held; but that joint assembly never elected a Senator, and adjourned without day on the 24th of February, 1897. There were certain proceedings under which it was claimed that there was a due organization of the house. During the last week of February, 1897, both senate and house, whichever body be treated as the lawful house, dispersed and were declared by their respective presiding officers adjourned without day. Thereafter, on the 6th day of March, 1897, Mr. Corbett was appointed to the vacancy by the governor. It seems clear that there was a recess of the legislature of Oregon on the 3d of March, 1897, and that there has been one ever since. The only question is of the power of the governor to make a temporary appointment.

It is clear, whatever may have been the nature of the organization of the legislature, that it had dispersed and come to an end before the 3d day of March, 1897, when the vacancy in the office of Senator took place by the limit of the term to which Mr. Mitchell had been chosen, and which he had held for six years. Any choice or appointment made after that time must be a choice or appointment for less than six years. The constitutional provision for the choice of Senators is as follows:

"ART. 1, SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; * * * if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

It is well settled, by a practice which has existed from the foundation of the Government, that vacancies so occurring after the beginning of a constitutional term may be filled by the legislature. If that be true they may be filled by the executive of the State during the recess of the legislature. The legislature is only authorized by the Constitution to fill such vacancies as might be filled by the executive by temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature. So if the executive have no power the legislature has no power. The executive may lawfully make a temporary appointment and the legislature fill that vacancy when it assembles, or the office must remain vacant for the rest of the six years. It has been said that a vacancy does not happen when it occurs by reason of the expiration of a certain term, or when the office has never been filled. But the Constitution uses the same language in When vacancies happen in the representation from any State the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies. (Art. 1, sec. 2.)

When the term of a Representative expires and the people have failed to elect a successor beforehand, which occurred very often when a majority was required for an election, the executive has always issued a writ of election to such vacancy as of course.

The provision as to executive offices is as follows:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session." (Art. 2, sec. 2.)

It is now well settled by long and uniform practice that this power exists when a vacancy happens in the constitutional sense, if the term of office limited by law expires during the recess of the Senate, or if a new office has been created which has never been filled, and the President makes the appointment in such case.

We think, therefore, that the governor of Oregon was entitled to make the appointment, and that Mr. Corbett is entitled to the seat.

"Mr. President, the proposition broadly laid down in the case of Mantle, which, with the case of Kensey Johns and that of Lanman, I contend, from the rule of stare decisis, is that where the legislature has an opportunity to elect and fails to elect, a governor can not appoint; but the reasoning in the cases goes beyond the facts, and points to the conclusion that under no circumstances can the governor appoint to fill an original vacancy commencing at the beginning of a term.

"It may be obiter to travel outside of the facts of a particular case and express an opinion upon matters not strictly necessary to the decision of the case in hand, but certainly, so far as the facts of this case go, they square with the facts of the Lanman case and the Kensey Johns case and the Mantle case.

"The adjudication of the Senate in these cases of Johns, Lanman, and Mantle forms the rule of stare decisis; and I ask where, under what circumstances, and under what conditions, could there be a more opportune application of the rule than in the adjudications by this body of the right of a member to fill a seat herein?

"We are called upon to perform a high constitutional duty; we are judges of the qualifications and elections of our members; and in the discharge of that duty in a particular case we must consult the Constitution; we must interpret that instrument according to our best judgment and our best ability; we must bring to bear upon the question not only the light of learning and jurisprudence but the aid of an enlightened conscience.

"Therefore it is, I say, Mr. President, that the rule of stare decisis as applied to the right of a seat in this body is of more importance than the application of rule to the judgments of courts deciding upon contracts and titles to property between private individuals. Here are three cases which, in my opinion, are on all fours with each other, that decide the point squarely and fairly, and there can be no evasion of their force as precedents.

"Mr. President, even if the legislature of Oregon was not technically organized, can this body tolerate such wanton disregard of legislative duty in order that the executive of a State may come in and do away with the performance of the duty of a legislature by discharging it himself? Is there any constitutional duty of this kind that can be transferred, either by direct act or by indirect method, from the legislature to the governor?

"I contend that the legislature of Oregon had ample opportunity, had ample power, to fill the vacancy arising from the expiration of the term of Hon. John H. Mitchell, and whether by intrigue, whether by political combination, whether by a total and flagrant disregard of its duty, it failed to elect a Senator when it was within its power and opportunity to so elect, no other authority or power can constitutionally perform a function and discharge a duty with which it was exclusively charged.

"I think it would be giving a premium for legislatures to disregard their duty; is would be giving a premium for cabals and intrigues and combinations of variout kinds to prevent the action of legislatures in order that governors of States might appoint their personal favorites, if the Senate would admit their appointees under the circumstances of this case.

"Mr. President, the legislatures are the great constituencies of this body. I would be loath to see these constituencies changed; but if anything would convince the American people that there ought to be a change, it would be the premium placed upon the disregard of legislative duty by the Senate of the United States in admitting the appointees of governors to seats in this body who ought only to hold their seats, under such conditions as surround the case of Mr. Corbett, by legislative election."

[Extracts from letter written by Henry W. Corbett to Mr. Chandler in relation to the claim of Mr. Corbett to a seat in the Senate. Found in the proceedings of February 8, 1898, in the Congressional Record, vol. 31, pp. 1535, 1536, 1537.]

"WASHINGTON, February 7, 1898.

"DEAR SIR: Since the meeting of your committee in May last, and since my brief was submitted to you at that time, other thoughts have presented themselves to my mind which I desire to lay before you in the following brief statement for your consideration and that of the Senate if, in your judgment, you think it worthy of perusal. I therefore review the case as briefly as I can, without trespassing too much upon your valuable time.

"(I quote from Ex. Doc. No. 62.)

"The members elected to the legislature of Oregon assembled at Salem, the seat of government, on the 11th of January, 1897. The senate effected a permanent organization with its 30 members. The house likewise assembled and appointed a committee on credentials, electing the usual officers for temporary organization until such time as said committee should report.

"The members of the house continued to meet from day to day until January 21, and on each day up to that date the temporary speaker declared that 'there being no quorum present, and there having been no report from the committee on credentials, the house could take no action upon any resolution.' On that day the temporary speaker of the house was removed by a resolution offered by one of its members (Mr. Brown). The temporary speaker having declined to entertain the motion, no quorum being present, Mr. Brown put the question, and Mr. Smith, having received a majority of the votes cast, was duly elected temporary speaker of the house of representatives in place of Mr. Davis, and assumed the chair beside the former temporary speaker, and thereafter, on the same day, 31 members took the oath of office.

"On the 18th of February the pretended organization of the house offered house resolution No. 16, declaring the seats of 29 of the members vacant, by reason of their not having taken the oath of office.

"On the 19th of February 28 members assembled, 4 being absent and 28 not having qualified. On the same day, on a call for a vote on this resolution, the yeas and nays were taken, and it was adopted by a vote of 16 yeas to 11 nays. On the 23d of February the house passed a resolution to adjourn on Wednesday, February 24, 1897, on which day they adjourned, or dissolved, and the members went to their homes.

"On the 3d of February the house attempted to organize the joint assembly, at which time there were present 11 members of the senate and 29 members of the house, 40 in all. As part of the proceedings on that occasion there was read the following (see Ex. Doc. No. 62, p. 66):

" 'FEBRUARY 2, 1897.

" 'By unanimous consent Senator Brownell introduced senate resolution No. 19.

" 'Senate resolution No. 19.

" 'Resolved, That the senate now proceed openly by viva voce vote of each member present to name one person for Senator in Congress from the State of Oregon for the full term commencing March 4, 1897.

" 'The president ruled: "In view of the fact that no organization of the house of representatives has yet been effected, and the act of Congress regulating the time and manner of electing Senators in Congress providing that such vote shall be taken on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the legislature, the resolution is not in order and can not be entertained at this time by the senate."

" 'Senator Brownell appealed from the decision of the chair. After a full discussion, the yeas and nays were called for by Senators Brownell, Johnson, and Driver, the question being:

" ' "Shall the decision of the chair be sustained and stand as the judgment of the senate?"

" 'On this question the roll was called, and the vote was:

" 'Yeas, 16.

" 'Nays, 12.

" 'Absent, 1.

" 'Not voting, 1.

" 'So the decision of the chair was sustained, and the senate declined to consider senate resolution No. 19.'

* * * * * * *

"There were at no time present, as appears from this executive document, to exceed 40 members in attempted joint convention, and there were only present and voting in the pretended organization of the house to exceed 33 members, whereas section 3, article 4, of the constitution of the State of Oregon provides that 'the house of representatives shall consist of 60 members.' Section 12 of the same article provides that 'two-thirds of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business.' The same section says that 'a quorum must be in attendance before an organization thereof can be effected.' Two-thirds of 60 being 40, it is necessary that 40 members should assemble together to constitute a quorum and effect an organization or transact any other business, and must be properly organized before proceeding to vote for a United States Senator or passing any laws.

"The Constitution of the United States provides that 'no State shall be deprived of equal representation in the Senate,' while Article I, section 3, of the said Constitution provides:

" 'If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy.'

"The word 'happen' has been commented upon as not embracing such a case as that now before the senate for consideration. My contention is that a resignation is a voluntary act, as stated by Senator Edmunds in his debate on the Bell case on the 10th of April, 1879, as follows:

" 'The word "happen," it has been said, means a casualty, a contingency. So it does. It also means anything that takes place or occurs, that comes to pass. By what authority do constitutional lawyers, when a word of several meanings is used which includes several particulars within those meanings, say that it means half of what it means by the dictionary and by the common understanding of mankind now, as it was then? By what species of law or of logic are we to be told that a word is to be shorn of half its meaning? The Constitution does cover the case of a death, undoubtedly. That happens. It happens much more than a resignation does. A resignation, in the sense of chance, does not happen at all—in that sense "happen," because a resignation does not come by chance. It comes by the free will of the person who is competent to make it. Therefore, in order to give "resignation" any force in that sense as having happened, you must take some other meaning of the word than chance or casualty, because it is neither chance nor casualty. It is just as much the definite and public act of the person who has the right to make it as the passage of an act of Congress is by this Congress, precisely. It is an act of deliberate free will, and if it were not it would be void.'

"I contend that a failure to elect by a legislature, either by resignation of that body before an election occurs, or by the failure of the legislature to organize and elect before the vacancy occurs, is as much a voluntary act of the legislature as is the resignation of a Senator. If we are to be guided strictly by this meaning and eliminate the words of the Constitution 'or otherwise,' it would seem to exclude even the death of a Senator. Therefore we contend that it must be given a broader meaning than has been attempted to be conveyed by others who have discussed this question. I find no warrant in the Constitution for refusing to seat a Senator who has been appointed by the governor of his State to fill a vacancy occurring during a recess of the legislature.

"The members of the legislature of Oregon met on the 11th of January. The house, failing in obtaining a quorum, dispersed on the 24th of February, and the senate on the 2d of March, the forty days having expired for which they could only receive pay. The vacancy occurred on the 4th of March, at 12 o'clock m., and the governor appointed the applicant on the 6th of March. The governor sets forth in his certificate that there has been no legal legislative session since the biennial session of 1895. Therefore, there being no legislature, as stated, this case comes clearly within the precedents established in the early history of the Government and cited in my brief (see p. 22) in the case of William Cooke, of Tennessee, 1797; Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, 1801; William Hindman, of Maryland, 1801; Samuel Smith, of Maryland, term expiring 1803; Aaron Ogden, of New Jersey, 1803; Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, 1809; Charles Cutts, of New Hampshire, 1813; John Williams, of Tennessee, 1817; all of whose terms expired on March 3 of the respective years.

"I see no warrant or provision in the Constitution whereby the Senate is authorized to discipline a State for not electing a Senator, even when there has been a legally organized legislature, and certainly not when there has been no legal organization of the legislature under the constitution of the State of Oregon under which it was admitted as a member of the Union. The Constitution of the United States provides how such a legislature shall be disciplined and what shall be the remedy in case of a failure to elect (the vacancy occurring during its recess), namely, that in such an event the governor may appoint to fill the vacancy, by temporary appointment to fill such vacancy until the meeting of the next legislature.

"Factions will exist, parties will differ, in some cases the choice of Senators will be delayed, and it is impossible to meet all the contingencies that may arise in this connection without an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by the people. Therefore, until that action is taken I can not see how the Senate can deprive a State of equal representation therein. The legislature is elected by the people. The governor is likewise elected by the people, and the same obligation rests upon him as upon the legislature for keeping the State fully represented in the Senate.

"To me, personally, it is a question of little moment, but the right of a State to equal representation in this body can not be denied, in my judgment, properly, as many cases will arise in the future where a great injustice to such States will be done. It may not be inappropriate for me to state that this appointment was tendered without solicitation or authorization on my part to solicit the same for me through any other person or party, and so far as intimation has been made that a combination was entered into with the governor to defeat the election of a Senator for the purpose of my appointment, it is entirely unwarranted and untrue, and no one would impute such motives to our governor, who has sacrificed some of the best years of his life in the defense of his country, has served with honor and distinction as a judge of the supreme court of our State, and who lives in a modest way in his little cottage, and all that he has—or mainly so—is his good name and reputation, which he has honorably maintained for years past in our community. I trust you will excuse me for alluding to this personal matter, and I should not have done so had it concerned myself alone, but when such motives are insinuated or imputed to the honorable executive of our State it is due to him that I should publicly make this statement.

"In closing I quote from a letter from Hon. George F. Edmunds, one of the best-known constitutional lawyers, who says that the appointee is entitled to his seat, that 'this case comes clearly within the letter and spirit of the Constitution.'

"Very respectfully,

"H. W. CORBETT.

"Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
"Chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, United States Senate."

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Pettus in support of the resolution declaring Mr. Corbett not entitled to a seat as a Senator from the State of Oregon. Found in the proceedings of February 9, 1898, in the Congressional Record, vol. 31, pp. 1586, 1587.]

"Mr. President, I propose to prove that the question now before the Senate has been decided in such a way that it ought to remain settled forever. I do not mean when I say the case has been decided that it has been decided once or twice or three times and therefore ought to remain settled, but it has been decided in such a way as that the Senate ought to be willing to allow the law to be known. It is nothing but a question of law.

"In the first place, in the case of Kensey Johns, the first of the election cases in the Senate, the identical question we are now considering was decided, and not only decided, but in the decision the Senate gave the reason for the decision, and that reason is stated in the resolution.

"'George Read, a Senator from Delaware, resigned his seat in December, 1793, during the recess of the legislature of said State. The legislature met in January and adjourned in February, 1794. On the 19th of March Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy. It was determined that Mr. Johns was not entitled to his seat, a session of the legislature having intervened between the resignation of Mr. Read and the appointment of Mr. Johns.'

"Here is the resolution:

"'Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.'

"That decision was made prior to the act of 1866, designating the legislature by which Senators should be elected, but it involves exactly the same principle. Not long afterwards there were divers other cases which came up, involving kindred questions. I am only going to call the attention of the Senate to two cases bearing directly on this subject in the early period of our history. There are a great many other cases bearing on this subject, but it would weary the Senate to have them all called to its attention. I desire now merely to call to the attention of the Senate the case of Samuel S. Phelps, appointed Senator from the State of Vermont. I will read the facts:

"'Mr. Phelps was appointed by the governor of Vermont, January 17, 1853, during the recess of the legislature, to fill a vacancy in the Senate happening by the death of William Upham. His credentials were presented and he took his seat January 19. The legislature met in October and adjourned in December without electing a Senator to fill the unexpired term. Mr. Phelps had held the seat during the remainder of the second session of the Thirty-second Congress, ending March 3, and during the special session of the Senate, March 4 to April 11. December 29 he again attended. January 4, 1854, the Senate resolved that the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether he was entitled to retain his seat. January 16 the committee reported the resolution "that the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to his seat in the Senate of the United States." It was accompanied by a minority report adverse to the right of Mr. Phelps to a seat. March 16 the resolution reported by the committee was rejected by a vote of 12 yeas to 26 nays; and it was "Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is not entitled to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States.'"

"The minority report in that case contains some interesting history on that subject, but I shall not consume the time of the Senate in discussing it. I want it understood that I am not debating the question as to what ought to have been decided. I am not debating it on that theory. I am debating it on the theory that it has been decided over and over again one way, and then, as it is said, adversely; and that members have been seated here, without objection, contrary to the ruling of those early cases. It is true members were seated contrary to those early decisions.

"The next phase of the case was brought up by what are called the New Hampshire cases. It is claimed and asserted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Chandler] in his argument, that the decision in these cases proves the correctness of the minority report in this particular case. I do not consider that the decision goes to that extent, but it goes a long way in that direction.

"There is no use in reading the Blair nor the Bell case. They are familiar to you all. They grew out of a particular situation in the State of New Hampshire in its constitution and the act of 1866. The act of 1866 requires that the legislature elected next before the vacancy shall fill it—the legislature elected, not the legislature sitting, not even the old legislature if it be in session, but the legislature elected next before the vacancy. It so happened that under the constitution of New Hampshire when these vacancies occurred a legislature had been elected, but it did not sit until the next year. Therefore that legislature could not elect under the law of 1866, it not being in session, and by the constitution of the State not to be in session until there was a vacancy. The old legislature could not elect, although it might have been in session, because it was not the legislature designated by the act of Congress.

"Now you will observe that the Senate in the Blair and the Bell cases from New Hampshire, and in another case from New Hampshire, departed to some extent from the old ruling, by holding that as the State was in such a situation that the legislature could not elect, therefore the governor could appoint, and appoint to a full term. I have read these cases here. They are very ably argued on both sides. I do not intend to go into the argument, as I said at first, but you will notice that there is a wide distinction between cases where the legislature of the State could not possibly elect under the law and cases where the legislature of the State was actually in session and ordered by the law of the United States to elect a Senator and refused to do it.

"That is all that the New Hampshire cases determine. They made it a matter of necessity. True, they went to the full extent of declaring that a governor could fill a whole term. As I said before, there were other cases where the Senate had allowed persons appointed to a whole term, who had been appointed by the governor after the legislature had been in session, to take their seats without any question. A number of cases were cited by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Chandler] in his argument a few days ago. So this case had been variously decided when the great Mantle case came up, and in that case the gentleman who made the report in favor of Mr. Mantle, and another, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. Turpie], contended most earnestly that now was a chance to settle this question, and 'let us settle it now and forever.' That is the meaning of it. I hope those gentlemen do not belong to that class of men who think a question never is or can be settled until it is settled according to their own peculiar views. I want to show exactly how that question was debated in the Mantle case.

"The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] was the first to lead off in what I consider this line of conservative wisdom, because there is no doubt in the world that you had better have a case settled and allow the people and the country to know what the law is, than to be forever debating it in this body. The Senator from Massachusetts, who made the report and led the debate, used this language, and, if it means anything, it means the very thing for which I am contending here:

"'I am gratified that this question now arises under circumstances where it can be settled without any thought or imputation of partisanship upon any Senator delivering his judgment, because, although it happens there are two Republicans and one Democrat affected by these reports, there is a Senator in this body, who took his seat on the 4th of March without question, whose title depends upon virtually the same thing.' (Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pt. 1, p. 43.)

"There was a proposition on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts to have this thing settled here in this case, where we could have a fair chance, the Senator from Florida [Mr. Pasco] having been admitted and liable to be turned out, and there being two Democrats on one side and two Republicans on the other, and all depending virtually on the same subject.

"When I speak of the Mantle case I wish Senators to include in it the two other cases decided at the same time. The great Mantle case was debated from March until away into August before it was decided, and it was debated by many of the strongest men in the Senate at that time. The distinguished lawyer now occupying a seat as the senior Senator from Indiana, speaking on the same side of the same question, said he wanted the case decided once forever, just like the Senator from Massachusetts. He said:

"'It would be perhaps as fair a way as any to treat this as a case of first instance, the same as if no decision had been made upon it, and to remit the present court, the members of this body sitting in judgment, to the text of the Constitution itself, to the letter of the passage relating to the appointing power, and the spirit of the context in which it is found, and the tenor and purpose of the whole instrument.' (Cong. Rec., vol. 25, pt. 1, p. 68.)

"Evidently both of those Senators had in their minds that this vexatious question had been before the Senate for a long time and that it ought to be settled, and they proposed a settlement in the words I have read, and it was settled; that is, it was decided. But if we are forever to treat this question in a partisan sense, if we are forever to debate it, then the debate will only work injury to the country at large.

"Mr. President, the importance of having the law decided and known can not be overestimated. Some men treat it as a trifling circumstance that a question has been decided for fifty years one way, and overturned by that sort of logic which some men have which can prove a lie to their own satisfaction. The judicial learning of the United States, especially in the last thirty or forty years, ought to be a lesson to all mankind of the importance of adhering to that which has been the settled law for ages."

"Mr. President, I am reluctant to take the time of the Senate, but having, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, joined the minority in a report that Mr. Corbett is entitled to a seat, I feel it to be my duty to state, as rapidly as may be, the grounds upon which I base my action.

"This is a question, Mr. President, of the very highest possible privilege. The term of the Hon. John H. Mitchell, as a Senator from the State of Oregon, expired on the 4th day of March, 1897. The vacancy occurred during a recess of the legislature; and acting, as he thought, and as I think, within the authority of the Constitution of the United States, the governor of Oregon appointed Mr. Corbett Senator and sent him here to submit to the Senate his right to a seat.

"When I was formerly a member of this body the right of Mr. Blair, of New Hampshire, to a seat by the appointment of the governor came before the Senate, and, while I did not participate in the debate, I examined the question with some care and satisfied myself that Mr. Blair was entitled to a seat. I have reexamined the question, and I do not regard my own right to a seat in this body as any higher or better established in law than I do the right of Mr. Corbett to represent here in part, for the time being, the State of Oregon.

"Preliminarily, it is said that this question ought to be considered by the Senate as settled because of the decision in the Lanman case, in the Kensey Johns case, in the Phelps case, and in the Mantle case; in other words—the proposition is not distinctly made by a majority of the committee in their report, but in part so, and emphasized by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Pettus]—that this question ought not even to be debated, but that unanimously, as upon a question which is settled, Senators here, regardless of their individual judgment, should vote that Mr. Corbett is not entitled to a seat.

"Mr. President, the doctrine of stare decisis is a well-recognized doctrine. The Senator from Alabama spoke correctly when he said that its importance could not be overestimated. The books speak of it as a rule of public policy. That is accurate, but not as strong as the fact will warrant. With the growth of business, with the necessity for stability in judicial decisions, certainty as to rules of property, and the foundation of business transactions in the world, it has grown to be a rule of public necessity, founded originally, of course, in public policy; but it has always been regarded, I think, as a rule applicable only to the decisions of courts, and that, too, to the decisions of courts of last resort. It is not a rule as arbitrary and unyielding even as applied to courts as the Senator from Alabama seems to think. Chancellor Kent says in his Commentaries:

"'But I wish not to be understood to press too strongly the doctrine of stare decisis, when I recollect that there are more than one thousand cases to be pointed out in the English and American books of reports which have been overruled, doubted, or limited in their application.'

"The volume of overruled, doubted, and discredited cases, which will readily be found in the law library to-day, is almost as large as Webster's Dictionary. All judicial decisions are not subject to the doctrine of stare decisis. The rule of res adjudicata is very much broader than the rule of stare decisis. Whether a court will adhere to a decision which has been acquiesced in, even though they have doubts, not simply as to its 'technical accuracy' but as to its correctness, depends upon the character of the question, the length of time during which the decision has been acquiesced in, and whether it has entered into and become a rule of property or a rule of business. The Supreme Court of the United States has stated this proposition well in the case of the Minnesota Mining Company v. National Mining Company et al. (3 Wallace, 332), where Mr. Justice Grier said:

"'Where questions arise which affect titles to land, it is of great importance to the public that when they are once decided they should no longer be considered doubtful. Such decisions become rules of property, and many titles may be injuriously affected by their change. Legislatures may alter or change their laws without injury, as they affect the future only, but where courts vacillate and overrule their own decisions on the construction of statutes affecting the title to real property, their decisions are retrospective and may affect titles purchased on the faith of their stability. Doubtful questions on subjects of this nature, when once decided, should be considered no longer doubtful or subject to change.'

"But even as applied to the decisions of courts, I repeat the courts have not been in the habit of holding themselves bound without discrimination by former decisions for whatever length of time they may have been acquiesced in. It depends upon the character of the question and the effect of disturbing the decision.

"I looked into Wells on res adjudicata and stare decisis to see if I could find noted the distinction in the applicability of this doctrine of stare decisis with reference to the class of questions or decisions, and find that he cites two leading cases—one a Wisconsin case. The supreme court of Wisconsin held valid the act of the legislature exacting from railway companies in the State, by way of license in lieu of other taxes, a percentage of the gross earnings, it being attacked as being in violation of the clause of the constitution which requires the rule of taxation to be uniform.

"Mr. GRAY. The State constitution?

"Mr. SPOONER. The State constitution; and the court held that the act was constitutional. Years after, a new court considering the question as a new question, and arguing it with very great ability, came to the conclusion, and so announced, that the original interpretation of the constitution was without good warrant of law; but when it was brought to the attention of the court that the former decision had become a rule of property in the State, and that to overturn it would overturn thousands of titles which had grown up, based upon it, and disturb all the tax proceedings in the intervening years, the court declared that, in view of the harmful result to follow, they felt obliged within the doctrine of stare decisis to allow the decision to stand, although were it nova res they would hold differently.

"The author, referring in the same connection to a case from Texas, says:

"'But the Texas court, speaking of the same subject of taxation, in reference to the constitutional provision lays down some limitations, which, doubtless, may be properly admitted, to the effect that where the decisions relate not to matters of title, or contract, but abstractly to the structure of the Government, the limits of executive and legislative power, etc., the doctrine of stare decisis does not apply. I give, however, the views of the court verbatim on this important topic.'

"The supreme court of Texas has well earned in later years—I do not know so much of it before—by learning, by strong reasoning, and the utmost judicial assiduity, the favor of the profession and of the courts with which their decisions are now received.

"'The proper determination of each of these cases depends upon the validity or invalidity of the 'Act to organize and maintain a system of public schools,' approved April 24, 1872, and the authority conferred thereby to collect the taxes brought in question in them. The constitutionality of this law, and the liability of the taxpayer for these taxes, has been sustained by this court. * * * It may be, therefore, thought that the question should not be regarded by us as now open for discussion'—

"That is the doctrine of the Senator from Alabama—

"'that whatever might be our views in respect to it, upon the principle of stare decisis we should hold it as definitely settled and concluded.

"'We can not, however, regard the rule of stare decisis as having any just application to questions of the character involved in these cases. This doctrine grows out of the necessity for a uniform and settled rule of property and a definite basis for contracts and business transactions. If a decision is wrong, it is only when it has been so long the rule of action as that time and its continued application as the rule of right between parties demand the sanction of its error; because when a decision has been recognized as the law of property, and conflicting demands have been adjusted, and contracts have been made with reference to and on faith of it, greater injustice would be done to individuals and more injury result to society by a reversal of that decision, though erroneous, than to follow and observe it. But when a decision is not of this character, upon no sound principle do we feel at liberty to perpetuate an error into which either our predecessors or ourselves may have unadvisedly fallen merely upon the ground of such erroneous decision having been previously rendered.

"'The questions to be considered in these cases'—

"As the question to be considered and determined in this matter, even if this were a court—

"'have no application whatever to the title or transfer of property, or to matters of contract. They involve the construction and interpretation of the organic law, and present for consideration the structure of the Government, the limitations upon legislative and executive power as safeguards against tyranny and oppression. Certainly it can not be seriously insisted that questions of this character can be disposed of by the doctrine of stare decisis.'

"Therefore, a question like that now before the Senate, even if it were pending before a court, would not be so far regarded as settled by a prior adjudication as to properly preclude a court from reviewing its decision and settling it in harmony with its judgment as to constitutional construction.

"But, Mr. President, this doctrine of stare decisis, as I said before, applies to courts. Nobody ever heard before, so far as I am aware, of an attempt to apply it strictly and firmly and broadly, as the Senator from Alabama attempts to do, to the decisions of the Senate, of the House of Representatives, and of the different branches of the legislatures in dealing with contested election cases."

[Extracts from remarks of Mr. Foraker in opposition to the resolution that Hon. Henry W. Corbett is not entitled to take his seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Oregon. Found in the proceedings of February 26, 1898, in volume 31 of the Congressional Record, pages 2225, 2226, 2227, 2228.]

"Mr. President, the debate with respect to the seating of Mr. Corbett is already long protracted. It is not too much to say, perhaps, that every legitimate argument that can be presented on both sides has been presented to the Senate. Surely I am justified in saying, after the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner], that I might well be content to discharge my duty with the simple casting of my vote in favor of the seating of Mr. Corbett, as I shall cast it, for that speech was elaborate, masterly, and to my mind conclusive.

"Yet, Mr. President, I feel with respect to this matter as though I want to do something more than cast my vote. I want to at least briefly give the reasons why I do not intend to follow, as Senators have been insisting we should follow, the decision in the Mantle case. I do not intend to follow it, because in my judgment it was an erroneous decision. I think it was so regarded by the legal profession generally throughout the country at the time when that decision was made, for whether the Senators who were then here and made that decision recognized the fact or not, it was, I think, generally thought throughout the country that the silver question had more to do with the making of that decision than legal principles.

"I think the fact that that decision was erroneous is recognized by the Senators who are speaking in opposition here now in this debate to the seating of Mr. Corbett when they make to us the elaborate arguments that they have been making about the doctrine of stare decisis.

* * * * * * *

"But now to recur to what I was about to say. Our action in determining whether or not a Senator who comes here with credentials shall be seated is not judicial action. I need not stop to read, for all Senators are familiar with the fact that the Constitution of the United States, in the third article, provides that the judicial power of this Government shall be conferred upon certain courts which are named in the Constitution, or which according to that provision are authorized to be created by statute. There is no conferring of judicial power upon any body but the courts. The legislative branch has no judicial power.

"I have not been able to find any decision of the Supreme Court directly in point upon that question in the limited time I have had to make an examination, but being familiar with a decision of the supreme court of Ohio that is directly applicable, I want to call attention to it. The constitution of the State of Ohio provides, just as the Constitution of the United States does, that the judicial power shall be conferred upon the courts enumerated in the constitution and authorized by statute. The constitution further provides that in all contested cases of election the trial shall be had before such tribunal as the legislature may appoint.

"The legislature of Ohio provided by statute that in every case of contested election of a judge the trial should be before the State senate. We had a judicial contest. It was brought before the State senate, and the State senate found against the contestee. I believe that is the way the case arose. At any rate the decision of the State senate came before our supreme court, and one of the questions involved was whether it was competent under our constitution to confer upon the State senate the power to hear and determine a case of contest. It was claimed that senators could not sit as judges in that contested-election case without exercising judicial power; but our supreme court said, in answering that proposition, that the judicial power was conferred upon the courts, and that while this involved a necessity to sit and hear testimony and pass judgment, yet it was not in an appropriate sense an exercise of judicial power, although approaching the exercise of judicial power in its nature, remarking in that connection that there were many powers which would be held to be legislative or judicial accordingly as the exercise of those powers might be conferred upon a court or upon a legislative body.

"I will not stop to read the case, but it is the case of The State v. Harmon (31 Ohio State Reports, p. 250). The case there is precisely what the case is here. The senate of Ohio was empowered to hear and determine. They had to hear and weigh testimony; they had to examine witnesses; they had to pass judgment; they had to determine rights. That is all we have to do in this case. We hear the testimony, we hear what the facts are, and we then apply the law to the case.

"Therefore it is that I do not believe we ought now to follow the decision in the Mantle case, because in my opinion that decision was erroneous, and because, Mr. President, this country has never accepted it and followed it in such a way as to make it appropriate to apply here, if otherwise it might be appropriately applied, the doctrine of stare decisis. No rights have been vested on account of it; no rule of property has been created on account of it; no rule of public policy will be violated that has been adopted on account of the Mantle case if we now depart from it. Therefore, if the Mantle decision was erroneous, as invoking the doctrine of stare decisis implies that it was and concedes that it was, we are under no obligation whatever to follow it and now make a second erroneous decision.

"In the next place I object to following it, Mr. President, because, not being a judicial decision, if it were otherwise on all fours with this case, the disposition of the Mantle case would not bind us now upon the doctrine of stare decisis or res adjudicata, because that doctrine can be applied only to a judicial decision, and that decision was not judicial. Judicial power in this country is conferred upon the courts. It is only when courts pass judgment upon those things with respect to which they have been given jurisdiction that judicial power is exercised and the predicate is laid for invoking the doctrine of stare decisis, other things being appropriate for its application.

"But, Mr. President, there is a stronger reason to my mind—if it be possible to have any stronger—than the one I have suggested why the decision in the Mantle case should not bind anybody in this case; why we should feel ourselves at liberty to take up this case and consider it res nova. It has been said here, and repeated over and over again, that this case is identical with the Mantle case upon the facts. I do not so understand it. Not only do I not understand the facts to be the same, but I can not comprehend how any Senator can make that statement about the facts, admitted and conceded to be what all agree that they are—but when I speak of facts I contradistinguish simple facts from the mixed case of law and fact.

"There is not any question but that in the Mantle case the legislature had met, had organized, and as an organized body was in session, with full power and opportunity to elect a Senator if it had seen fit to do so, and failed. In this case it is an admitted fact that while the members-elect to that general assembly had a meeting, they never did have an organization as a legislature under and in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the State of Oregon.

"I listened to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Turley] yesterday as he stated the undisputed facts. If I do not state them exactly as they are, I trust that he will correct me. The senate met—the members-elect. They had a temporary organization. They met subsequently and had a permanent organization, and there is not any question but that the senate of Oregon was duly constituted, duly met, duly organized, and duly in session, with power to do its part in the election of a Senator.

"As to the house the case was different. They met; they had a temporary organization; appointed a committee on credentials, and adjourned without anybody taking the oath of office. They never met again, except only a portion of them. The constitution of Oregon provides that two-thirds of the whole number of members elected, or 40—having reference to the figures that will represent the number of members of that house—shall constitute a quorum. There were never but 31 assembled after the first meeting; never but 31 members met who had taken the oath of office; there was not, therefore, ever a quorum of the house of Oregon in meeting or in session of any kind whatsoever, and yet it is said they were in session and full opportunity to elect a Senator.

"How is that said? It is said they were in session, because the constitution of Oregon provides that less than a quorum may adjourn from day to day, and shall have power to send for and compel the attendance of absent members; and because, while they were so sitting and adjourning from day to day and undertaking to compel the attendance of absent members, they were not subject to arrest; they were in the enjoyment of all the privileges conferred upon those who were in attendance upon the general assembly in the performance of their duties, and because, further, it is provided by the statute of Congress that on the second day of the Senatorial election, when the two houses of the legislature meet in joint session, they shall proceed with the election, provided there be a majority of both houses present.

"Well, now, Mr. President, let us examine that just for a moment. It does not seem to me that upon these facts there was a house of representatives in session when less than a quorum had taken the oath of office and were meeting from day to day and adjourning from day to day, with power to compel the attendance of absent members, and when it is admitted that they never did compel such attendance.

"Certainly it can not be contended that there was ever an organization of that house which met the requirements of the constitution of Oregon, and surely, for the purposes of organization, that constitution would be the organic and supreme law to govern the house of representatives. It does not cut any figure, Mr. President, that there was a majority present, or more than a majority, who had taken the oath of office, so long as the majority failed to be a quorum. If there had been only 10 members of the general assembly present who had taken the oath of office, who were meeting from day to day and adjourning from day to day, with power to send for the other members and compel their attendance, those 10 would have been just as much a legally organized and acting house of representatives of the State of Oregon as the 31 members were or ever could be. It does not make any difference, when you come to consider the question of organization, whether they had 31 members, or 21 members, or 10 members, or 5 members. So long as less than 40 members assembled and took the oath of office and undertook to act together, there was less than a quorum and never any organization. Nothing, it seems to me, can be more definitely established than that.

"How did the Senator from Tennessee yesterday, in his very able argument, with which I was pleased, although he differed from me in the opinion he was trying to uphold, undertake to say that that legislature, which he was compelled to admit never had any valid organization under the constitution of Oregon, had an opportunity to elect a Senator? He got around that by pointing out to us the language of the statute of the United States governing in such case and commenting upon that feature of it to which I have already adverted, that on the second day, if there be a majority of each house present, they may proceed to the election of a Senator. Ah, but, Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee skipped over lightly the preceding section of the statute. This statute can have no application or operation except only the condition precedent, for the second day's session, the joint session, shall have been complied with. What is the language of the statute? I will read section 14, title 2, chapter 1:

"'SEC. 14. The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.'

"When came the time—will some Senator please answer—when it was competent under this statute for the legislature of Oregon to proceed with the election of a United States Senator? This statute can have no application, can confer no power or authority, until after the legislature shall have met and shall have organized. When did it organize? The senate organized, we all agree; but the organization of the senate is not an organization of the legislature. When did the house organize? Never. That, Mr. President, is the crucial point in the whole case. There never was any organized legislature in the State of Oregon."

MONDAY, February 28, 1898.

Mr. Hoar moved to amend the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections by striking out the word "not," so as to make the resolution read:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Henry W. Corbett is entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Oregon."

A vote being taken thereon, the amendment was rejected by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Aldrich, Allison, Baker, Fairbanks, Foraker, Frye, Hanna, Hansbrough, Hawley, Hoar, Lodge, Mantle, Mason, Morrill, Perkins, Sewell, Turner, Wetmore, and Wilson—19.

Nays—Messrs. Allen, Bacon, Bate, Berry, Burrows, Butler, Caffery, Carter, Chilton, Clark, Clay, Cockrell, Cullom, Davis, Deboe, Faulkner, Gallinger, Gorman, Gray, Hale, Heitfeld, Jones (Ark.), Jones (Nev.), Kenney, Lindsay, McBride, McMillan, Mallory, Martin, Mills, Mitchell, Money, Nelson, Pasco, Penrose, Pettigrew, Pettus, Platt (Conn.), Rawlins, Roach, Shoup, Stewart, Teller, Thurston, Tillman, Turley, Turpie, Vest, Warren, and Wellington—50.

Thereupon a vote was taken on agreeing to the resolution as reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections and the same was agreed to by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Allen, Bacon, Bate, Berry, Burrows, Butler, Caffery, Carter, Chilton, Clark, Clay, Cockrell, Cullom, Davis, Deboe, Faulkner, Gallinger, Gorman, Gray, Hale, Heitfeld, Jones (Ark.), Jones (Nev.), Kenney, Lindsay, McBride, McMillan, Mallory, Martin, Mills, Mitchell, Money, Nelson, Pasco, Penrose, Pettigrew, Pettus, Platt (Conn.), Rawlins, Roach, Shoup, Stewart, Teller, Thurston, Tillman, Turley, Turpie, Vest, Warren, and Wellington—50.

Nays—Messrs. Aldrich, Allison, Baker, Fairbanks, Foraker, Frye, Hanna, Hansbrough, Hawley, Hoar, Lodge, Mantle, Mason, Morrill, Perkins, Sewell, Turner, Wetmore, and Wilson—19.

[Fifty-fifth Congress—Special session of the Senate.]

ANDREW T. WOOD, of Kentucky.

The term of Joseph C. S. Blackburn, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, expired March 3, 1897. The legislature of said State not being then in session, the governor of said State, on the 5th day of March, 1897, appointed Andrew T. Wood to fill the vacancy in the Senate caused by the expiration of the term of Mr. Blackburn. The credentials of Mr. Wood were presented in the Senate March 10, 1897, and were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. No report was submitted by the committee concerning the claim of Mr. Wood to a seat in the Senate. Afterwards William J. Deboe was duly elected by the legislature of the State of Kentucky to succeed Joseph C. S. Blackburn as a Senator from said State. Mr. Deboe appeared and took his seat in the Senate during the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and no further action was taken in respect to the claim of Mr. Wood.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings in the Senate in reference to the claim of Mr. Wood, as published in the Congressional Record.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1897.

The Vice-President presented a communication from the governor of Kentucky, which was read, as follows:

"COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
"Frankfort, Ky., March 5, 1897.

"SIR: I have the honor to notify you that I have this day appointed Andrew T. Wood, of Montgomery County, this State, Senator from Kentucky in the United States Senate (to supply the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of J. C. S. Blackburn as such Senator, which happened during the recess of the legislature of Kentucky, said body not being now in session) temporarily until the next meeting of said legislature and election thereby of his successor.

"In testimony of which, as governor of said Commonwealth, my name, with seal of State, is hereto attached, day and date above written, and in the one hundred and fifth year of the Commonwealth.

"WILLIAM O. BRADLEY.

"Attest:
"CHARLES FINLAY, Secretary of State.
"By E. D. GUFFEY, Assistant Secretary of State.

"Hon. GARRET A. HOBART,
"Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate."

Mr. Hoar moved that the Senator appointed from the State of Kentucky be admitted to take the oath.

On motion of Mr. Gorman the credentials presented, with the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[Fifty-fifth Congress, first session.]

JOHN A. HENDERSON, of Florida.

The term of Wilkinson Call as Senator from the State of Florida expired March 3, 1897. By the constitution of the State of Florida the legislature of that State was chosen in the month of October 1896, but did not meet until in the month of April, 1897. A special session of Congress having been called to begin on the 15th day of March, 1897, the governor of the State of Florida on the 6th day of March, 1897, appointed James A. Henderson to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of Mr. Call. The credentials of Mr. Henderson were presented in the Senate March 16, 1897, and his right to a seat in the Senate was discussed. The credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and attention having been called to a defect in the credentials, amended credentials were presented March 25, 1897, and referred to the same committee. No report was submitted by the committee, nor was any further action taken by the Senate in the matter. On the 14th day of May, 1897, Stephen R. Mallory was elected a Senator from the State of Florida for the term beginning March 4, 1897, and duly appeared and took his seat as such Senator.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings in the Senate in said case as published in the Congressional Record and extracts from the remarks of Mr. Hoar and Mr. Pasco in regard to referring the credentials of Mr. Henderson to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 16, 1897.

Mr. PASCO. I present the credentials of Mr. Henderson, who comes here by appointment of the governor of the State of Florida.

The credentials were read, as follows:

"STATE OF FLORIDA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

"I, W. D. Bloxham, governor of the State of Florida, by virtue of the authority in me vested by subdivision 2 of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, have, by reason of a vacancy happening from the expiration of the term of Hon. Wilkinson Call as United States Senator from the State of Florida on the 4th day of March, 1897, and during the recess of the legislature of said State, made temporary appointment of Hon. John A. Henderson, of Tallahassee, Leon County, Fla., who is duly qualified therefor under the Constitution of the United States, to be Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Florida from said 4th day of March, 1897, until the legislature of said State shall fill such vacancy.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Florida to be affixed.

"Done at Tallahassee, the capital, this 6th day of March, A. D. 1897.

"[SEAL.] W. D. BLOXHAM, Governor.

"By the governor. Attest:

"JNO. L. CRAWFORD, Secretary of State."

Mr. Pasco stated that Mr. Henderson was in waiting and asked that he be allowed to take the oath of office.

Mr. Allen moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Pasco. I am not willing to consent to that course. The case of Mr. Henderson is different in many respects from the two cases which have already been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I see no reason why there should be any delay whatever in admitting him to a seat. When I presented similar credentials myself four years ago, without any objection, without any motion, I was admitted to my seat; and Mr. Henderson's case is precisely the same as that which was then presented to the Senate.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator from Florida to the fact that there is a clear illegality in this proceeding, as disclosed by the credentials themselves. The governor has undertaken to appoint this gentleman to hold office until the legislature shall elect. He has no such power. He can only appoint, under the constitution, until the next meeting of the legislature. That has been extended by an ancient, well-settled construction to the time when the legislature either elects after meeting or adjourns without an election, but it never has been contended by anybody from the foundation of the Government that a governor could appoint until the legislature elected. They may meet and adjourn, and meet again and adjourn half a dozen times without an election. Strictly construed, this is an appointment not merely for six years, but forever, if the legislature of Florida do not elect. But, at any rate, the governor made this appointment supposing that he could appoint a man who would hold office certainly for the rest of the term of six years if the legislature of Florida did not agree. Non constat, if he were to appoint a man for a few days or weeks, he would not have appointed a very different person. So these credentials differ from all the other cases in the fact that they are materially defective themselves. Certainly the proposition which I make is grave enough to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

But I also desire, now I am up, to say to the Senator from Florida that, having studied this matter as thoroughly as I can, it seems to me that all these cases—the three which have now been presented and some others which have been settled by the Senate—are governed and ought to be governed by one simple principle, which would require all three of these applicants to be admitted, as it required Mr. Blair and Mr. Bell to be admitted, but which also would require the overruling of some recent and, it appears to me, quite erroneous action of the Senate. There ought to be a well-considered, careful dealing with this whole subject, first by the report of the committee, and afterwards by the action of the Senate. It is very much more important that we should extricate ourselves from the mud in which we have got on this matter of executive appointment than that any one gentleman should have the right of sitting a week or two earlier or later in this body.

When the Senator from Florida himself came in, everybody knew that the matter was merely formal. His election by his legislature in the course of two or three weeks was as sure as any such thing in the future ever would be, and to have kept him out while the committee scrutinized his credentials would have cost him his place on committees which he had earned by long service and would have left also the seat vacant. Therefore, his colleagues on both sides of the Chamber thought it was not worth while to raise the question.

Mr. President, I for one, as at present advised, after very careful study of the matter, agree with the Senator from Florida in one particular. I think—and I go further than I understood him to go—I think that the Constitution intended that this body should be always full, and that its framers did not mean to have any difficulties in the way. They were not quite so sure that the State legislatures would always elect or that Senators elected would always accept in those days. The seats here were not the objects of ambition when the Constitution was framed that they have become since. The powers of the United States Government were few—at any rate, those exercised were few—the subjects of our jurisdiction were limited. It was a painful and disagreeable thing in those days for a man to leave his home for the seat of government and travel here, and in many of the States there were fines established by law for the punishment of persons who refused to accept legislative and other public offices. I might add further that down even to Mr. Webster's time one of the serious dangers which Mr. Webster spoke of as menacing our Government was that it might fall to pieces by the failure of the State legislatures to elect Senators and of the people to elect Representatives. He contemplated that as one of the serious dangers to our Government down to 1825 or 1830.

It seems to me that the Constitution meant to say that when the legislature is in session it shall choose a Senator, and that if the office be vacant when the legislature is not in session a Senator shall be appointed ad interim by the great authority representing the State in all other of its great functions, the governor or executive, who in those days appointed the judges and the great officers of the State. There was a simple, ample, sufficient method of providing for the keeping of seats in this body always occupied by the representatives of the different States, and all the subtleties and refinements which have been born of political desires where the votes of Senators have been affected by the question whether the man was a silver man or a gold man, a Democrat or a Republican, have produced infinite mischiefs and have gone far to get us into difficulty, and I hope we shall go back to what was the simple and plain constitutional doctrine which was involved in the action by the Senate in the cases of Blair and Bell, and which was laid down in the report of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the cases of Lee Mantle and others.

(Cong. Rec., vol. 30, pp. 26, 27, and 29.)

The motion to refer the credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was agreed to.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1897.

Mr. Pasco presented the amended credentials of Mr. John A. Henderson, appointed a Senator from the State of Florida.

The credentials were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MATTHEW S. QUAY, of Pennsylvania.

The term of Matthew S. Quay, a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, expired March 3, 1899. The legislature charged with the duty of choosing his successor failed to elect. On the 21st day of April, 1899, the governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania appointed Matthew S. Quay a Senator from said State to supply the vacancy in the Senate of the United States occasioned by the expiration of the term of said Matthew S. Quay.

On the 4th day of December, 1899, the credentials of Mr. Quay were presented in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; also a resolution that Mr. Quay be admitted as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania in accordance with the appointment by the governor of said State. On the 23d day of January, 1900, the committee reported a resolution in the case of Mr. Quay, that he was not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania. This resolution was accompanied by the report of the committee and also the report of the minority of the committee, which alleged the right of Mr. Quay to a seat in the Senate.

After a full debate the resolution reported by the committee was adopted by a vote of 33 to 32.

The history of the case here given consists of a statement of the proceedings of the Senate in the case as published in the Congressional Record, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the report of the minority of the committee, a statement of the days on which the debates occurred, with a reference to the record of the same, a portion of the remarks of Senators in such debate, a statement of the vote on the amendment to the resolution reported by the committee, and a statement of the vote on the adoption of the resolution.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, December 4, 1899.

Mr. Penrose presented the credentials of Matthew S. Quay, appointed by the governor of Pennsylvania a Senator from that State, which were read, as follows:

"In the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, executive department.

"To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Whereas a vacancy exists in the representation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States by reason of the expiration of the constitutional term of the Hon. Matthew Stanley Quay and the failure of the general assembly of the Commonwealth to elect his successor: Therefore, know ye, that reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, integrity, and ability of the Hon. Matthew Stanley Quay, I, William A. Stone, governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in conformity to the provisions of clause 2 of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, have appointed, and do by these presents commission, him a Senator to represent this State in the Senate of the United States, to supply the vacancy in the Senate of the United States occasioned by the expiration of the term of office of the Hon. Matthew Stanley Quay, which occurred on the 4th day of March last. He is, therefore, to have and to hold the said office, together with all the rights, powers, and privileges thereunto belonging, or by law in any wise appertaining, until the next meeting of the legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or until his successor shall be duly elected and qualified, if he shall so long behave himself well.

"This appointment to compute from the day of the date hereof.

"Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at the city of Harrisburg, this 21st day of April, in the year of our Lord 1899 and of the Commonwealth the one hundred and twenty-third.

WILLIAM A. STONE.

"[SEAL.]

"By the governor:

"W. W. GRIEST, Secretary of the Commonwealth."

The credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Chandler submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

"Resolved, That Matthew S. Quay be admitted as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania in accordance with his appointment made on April 21, 1899, by the governor of the State."

Mr. Burrows presented a memorial in the nature of a remonstrance against the seating of the appointee by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania, which was received and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Jones, of Arkansas, presented a remonstrance by 78 members of the legislature of Pennsylvania against the seating of M. S. Quay as a Senator from said State, which was also referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

THURSDAY, January 4, 1900.

Mr. Hoar asked and obtained leave of the Senate to make a statement in the nature of a personal explanation, as follows:

"Mr. President. I receive in my mail daily a good many letters—and I dare say the same is true of all members of the Senate—appealing to me with great earnestness to vote to deny a seat in the Senate to a gentleman from Pennsylvania who claims a seat by reason of an appointment made in the recess of the legislature by the governor of that State. Some of the writers of these letters are Quakers—members of the Society of Friends; others are evidently very philanthropic persons; and I am to assume that they are very good judges of character, because their letters are full of personal compliments to myself [laughter], and I dare say the same is true of the letters received by other Senators. The proposition is, however, that I must vote—and they are surprised at my having any doubt about it—to deny a seat in this body to the gentleman who claims it under an appointment on the ground of certain charges that they make against him in regard to his personal character and fitness for the office.

"A good many years ago I investigated the question of the right of the governor of a State to appoint, and I suppose I have made eight or ten elaborate speeches during the last fifteen years in favor of the proposition that whenever, during the recess of the legislature of a State there was a vacant seat in the representation of that State in the Senate, the governor had the right to fill it, and I have made three or four reports in favor of that proposition.

"The Senate is the body, the court, the judge of the election of Senators. I am one of the sworn judges, and what these worthy gentlemen are asking me to do is, in substance, to stuff the ballot box and make a false return in my capacity as a sworn judge of elections because they think the governor of a State ought to have appointed somebody else.

"That is the attitude which these worthy gentlemen are taking, and I see that some newspapers of wide circulation in my own State affected to take the same view of the case. Of course the same principle would require Senators, if the legislature should elect this gentleman or some other against whom such charges can be maintained, to deny him a seat when the legislature has elected him. If the governor has no right to appoint or the legislature has no right to elect, then of course we do not admit the claimant. But if the governor have the right to appoint or the legislature have the right to elect, and we declare that they have not appointed him or have not elected him when they have, we are doing exactly what is done by ballot-box stuffers and election judges who make false returns.

"I hope this little statement of mine regarding such communications—in which I am sure every member of this body, without exception, will concur—will answer as a reply to the great batch of letters I am getting on this subject."

TUESDAY, January 23, 1900.

Mr. Turley, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported a resolution in the case of Matthew S. Quay, who claims the right to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania. He also submitted the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the said case; also the views of the minority of said committee.

The secretary read the resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania."

It was ordered that the resolution be placed on the Calendar and that the report of the Committee and the views of the minority be printed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of the same Senators named in the statement preceding the report in the case of Nathan B. Scott, supra.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 23, 1900.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Turley, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report (to accompany Senate resolution relative to admitting Matthew Stanley Quay, of Pennsylvania, to a seat as a Senator):

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Matthew Stanley Quay, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Pennsylvania, respectfully report:

Prior to March 3, 1899, Mr. Quay was a Senator in Congress from the State of Pennsylvania. His term of office, to which he had been elected by the legislature of Pennsylvania, expired by effiux of time on the 3d day of March, 1899. The legislature of Pennsylvania convened in regular session on the first Tuesday in January, 1899. On Tuesday, January 17, 1899, it began balloting for the purpose of selecting some one to succeed Mr. Quay and fill the vacancy which would occur on the 3d day of March, 1899. Daily ballots were taken in obedience to the provisions of the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, and of the Pennsylvania statute of January 11, 1867, from that date until April 19, 1899. The legislature adjourned April 20 without effecting an election. Thereafter, on April 21, 1899, the governor of Pennsylvania appointed Mr. Quay to represent the State of Pennsylvania in this body until the next meeting of the legislature.

It will thus be seen that the vacancy, which the governor of Pennsylvania has here attempted to provide for by a temporary appointment, was one which was foreseen, one which was caused by the expiration of a prior term, one which occurred while the legislature of Pennsylvania was in session, and one which that legislature had an opportunity of filling before it occurred, and also after it occurred, in the interim between the date of the occurrence and the appointment by the governor.

Under these facts we think that the appointment is invalid.

On behalf of Mr. Quay it is insisted that whenever a vacancy exists during the recess of a legislature, no matter when or how it happened or occurred, and no matter how often the legislature may have had an opportunity to fill it, the governor may appoint.

In the opinion of your committee whenever the legislature has had the right and an opportunity to fill a vacancy, either before or after it begins, the executive can not lawfully appoint.

The question involved is a constitutional one, a judicial one, and the Senate of the United States is the only court, the sole tribunal, which has jurisdiction over it and power to settle it. The Senate has had frequent occasion in the past to consider the power of the executives of States to make temporary appointments to seats in this body. But before going into the precedents thus established we will, as briefly as is consistent with the importance of the question, consider the provisions of the Constitution bearing upon it. The Constitution of the United States pertaining to this subject, Article I, section 3, provides:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall have assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

When this language is analyzed, giving to the words used therein their usual and ordinary meaning, it clearly appears that the paramount and controlling intent of the framers of the Constitution was: First, to give the States equal representation in the Senate, which carries with it the intent to always keep the Senate full; second, to have the Senators chosen by the legislatures of the various States; and third, to have all vacancies in the office of Senator filled by the legislatures. But it was seen that under our complex system of national and State governments vacancies might happen or occur at times when they could not be filled by the State legislatures, and that if provision was not made for such contingencies the equality of representation in the Senate might, for the time being, be destroyed; and to prevent this evil the power to make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislatures was given to the executives of the States.

Let us now consider the paragraph conferring the power of appointment on the State executive, again giving to the words used their ordinary meaning. It is "and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." What is a vacancy in the office of Senator? The original or full term is for six years. If the first incumbent dies or resigns, a vacancy occurs, happens, or begins. When the legislature has filled this vacancy it ceases to exist, and the term of office of the Senator thus chosen is measured by the unexpired time of the original term. A vacancy may again occur in the term of office of the second Senator which will exist until it is filled by the legislature, and the term of office of the Senator thus chosen will again be measured by the unexpired time of the original term. It is thus manifest that there can be but one vacancy in any one term. "A vacancy in an office is a unit. It can not happen or occur but once."

After a vacancy in the office of United States Senator occurs or comes to pass, if the next legislature does not fill it, it continues to exist. It is the same vacancy, not a new one. Now the State executive is given power to make temporary appointments in case of a vacancy, not as long as it continues or exists, but only until the next meeting of the legislature, which is then required to fill the vacancy. This clearly means that the paramount intent to have the legislature choose the Senators is to prevail, and that, whenever the legislature has had the opportunity to fill the vacancy, either before or after it occurs, the executive has no power to appoint. And when we take the phrase "if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State," if we concede that the general word "otherwise" is not qualified nor limited by the specific word "resignation," and that it includes vacancies which are caused by efflux of time and which can be foreseen, as well as vacancies which are caused by a casualty or the happening of an unexpected event and which can not be foreseen, still it must be construed and defined with reference to the balance of the phrase so as to give effect to all its parts; and it thus results that the vacancy, no matter how it is produced, must happen, take place, or begin during a recess of the legislature; and this of itself would be decisive against Mr. Quay's claim.

As to the proper definition to be here given to the word "happen," your committee is of opinion that the primary or ordinary meaning of the word carries with it the idea or element of uncertainty, as is clearly shown by the report of the minority of this committee in the Lee Mantle case (Senate Report No. 1, Fifty-third Congress, special session), pages 14, 15, and 17, which report was sustained by the Senate. But suppose that we give it the meaning attributed to it in the report of the majority of the committee in the Mantle case, page 4, and admit that it means "to take place," "to occur," "to come to pass," the result will be the same. Applying these equivalents of "happen" to a vacancy—a vacancy, all will admit, "takes place," "occurs," "comes to pass" at a fixed moment; that is, at its very beginning. Having "taken place," "occurred," "come to pass," it may continue indefinitely, but it does not continually and momentarily "take place," "occur," nor "come to pass" again and again. Hence a vacancy must begin or commence during a recess of the legislature before the executive can appoint.

Thus construed, this clause of the Constitution affords every facility for always keeping the Senate filled with Senators who are the real representatives of their respective States. A Senator who is chosen by the legislature of his State is likely to be the choice of the majority of the citizens of his State. A Senator who is appointed by an executive is frequently only the personal or political favorite of the executive.

The legislature, as we construe the clause, chooses the Senator in the first instance. If he declines to serve or dies before he is inducted into office; or if, after qualifying, he dies, resigns, or is expelled the executive may make a temporary appointment until the legislature meets again; or if, owing to changes in State constitutions, as in the New Hampshire cases to be mentioned hereafter, the legislature, which is authorized to fill the term at its commencement, can not meet until after the term has commenced, the executive can also make a temporary appointment.

Every contingency is thus provided for except the sole contingency that the legislature will fail to perform its sworn duty. Against a contingency of this kind the framers of the Constitution did not intend to provide. As was said by the minority of the committee in the Mantle case:

"That the Constitution expresses a strong or controlling purpose to keep the representation of each State full in the Senate is manifested by its specific provisions for filling regular terms both at the beginning and as they legally expire, and by providing for any accidental or unforeseen casualties by which seats thus filled might become vacant otherwise than by legal expiration of terms. Further than this no man can say that the Constitution makers intended to go. It can not for a moment be supposed that they contemplated or intended to provide for a case where either the legislature or the governor of a State should wantonly or with any other motive or for any reason either refuse or fail to perform their duty in the creation of Senators. This would have been to express a doubt and want of faith in the perpetuity of the structure which they were building. On the contrary, it is just and reasonable to suppose that, having invested each State with certain specific rights as to representation in this body, and imposed upon them the duty of exercising these rights in a certain specified way, patriotism and self-interest would combine to secure the enjoyment of these rights more effectually than any provision which they could possibly insert in the Constitution."

Again, consider the words, "the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature." The plural "appointments" is used to conform to "vacancies." The entire section deals with "Senators," "two Senators from each State," and the plural forms "vacancies" and "appointments" were more convenient and in better style. And, besides, a case might happen where two vacancies would occur in the same State during the same recess of the legislature. But the material point is that the power granted is not general, but temporary and limited. It is not a general power to fill vacancies by appointments whenever they occur and as long as they exist; on the contrary, it is a special power to supply certain kinds of vacancies for a limited or fixed period.

If we examine this clause of the Constitution in the light of the proceedings of the convention of 1787, the conclusion which we have reached will be strengthened and fortified. Several plans for the selection of Senators were submitted. Two, differing in detail, contemplated their selection by the House of Representatives; one contemplated their election by the people; one by electors chosen by the people; two provided that they should be chosen by the legislatures; and one that they should be appointed by the President out of a proper number of persons nominated by the legislatures. There was no suggestion that State executives should appoint them. It was finally agreed that the States should have equal representation in the Senate and that Senators ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures. The matter was then referred to the committee on detail. The clause, as reported by the committee on detail, was as follows:

"The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote."

It will be noticed that under the clause, as thus reported, the power of appointment was vested in the executive in any condition of vacancy. In other words, the clause contained apt language to express the very idea upon which Mr. Quay now bases his claim to a seat in this body. If that clause had been adopted, undoubtedly the executive would have had the right to appoint as long as the vacancy existed, no matter how often the legislature, after the vacancy occurred, might have met and failed to fill it. The clause, as thus reported by the committee on detail, came up for discussion on the 9th of August. Objection was made to giving the executives of States the power of temporary appointment in any case. It was suggested, however, that it was necessary to repose the power of temporary appointment somewhere inasmuch as Senators might resign or refuse to accept election. Quoting from the debates of the convention, "Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after 'vacancies' and insert the words 'happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.'"

This amendment was, for the time, adopted The clause then read as follows:

"The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature."

It will again be seen that under Mr. Madison's amendment the vacancy could be filled by the executive no matter when it happened nor how often the legislature had failed to fill it. Under this amendment, if a vacancy happened during a session of the legislature and the legislature failed to fill it, or if it happened during a recess of the legislature, the executive could appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, and then if the legislature failed to fill the vacancy, the executive could again appoint. Thus the clause as originally reported by the committee on detail, and as amended by Mr. Madison, placed the power of appointment in the hands of the executive without regard to the time at which the vacancy began.

The matter then went to the committee on style, revision, and arrangement. That committee reported on September 12, and the third section of Article I read in its report just as it now does in the Constitution, excepting that it did not contain the final words "which shall then fill the vacancy." On September 14 these last-mentioned words were added by amendment, and this clause of the Constitution was thus completed as it now stands.

It is to be remembered that many of the members of this convention were trained lawyers and all were men of great intellect and fine education. Undoubtedly they well understood the meaning of words and how to use apt terms to express their views and intentions. It can scarcely be conceived that they, without fully understanding what they were doing, rejected words and phrases which gave the power of appointment to the executive in any and every condition of vacancy and substituted therefor words which naturally and appropriately limit his power of appointment to vacancies occurring, happening, or taking place during a recess of the legislature.

Much stress has been laid upon the fact that when Mr. Madison offered his amendment to the clause as reported by the committee on detail he stated that it was done in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators or whether they could refuse to accept. We might well say that, if this was the idea which induced Mr. Madison to offer the amendment, he also intended, for he well knew the rules of construction which applied in all such cases, to limit the power of appointment to vacancies happening by causes of like kind and character as a refusal to accept or a resignation.

But certainly the convention itself was not devoting its attention to the question as to whether a Senator could resign or refuse to accept; on the contrary, the great object of its consideration was how to create the Senate. If it had been intended to simply give Senators the right to resign or refuse to accept, how easy it would have been to have done so in apt and simple words, and why was not some similar provision enacted in reference to members of the House of Representatives?

The history of the proceedings of the convention in reference to this clause of the Constitution demonstrates that the controlling purpose was to have the Senators elected by the legislatures, to have all vacancies filled by the legislatures, and to deny to the executive the power to appoint whenever the legislature had had the opportunity to fill the vacancy. We quote again from the report of the minority of the committee in the Mantle case, pages 15 and 16:

"It is illogical in the extreme to contend that the method of supplying a casual vacancy in the Senate contains the controlling purpose of the Constitution. If the frequency and emphasis of the words are considered, much stronger would be the argument that the election of Senators by the legislatures of the States is the controlling purpose. Look at the language: 'The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof'—not appointed by governors or anyone else—'immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election'—not first appointment—'after dividing them into three classes'—the language is—'so that one-third may be chosen'—not appointed—'every two years. And if vacancies happen by resignation, etc., the executive may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"The power of the executive is, 'may make temporary appointments,' while the injunction to the legislature is 'shall be chosen'—the one is mandatory and the other permissive; and yet they say the permissive power controls and is paramount to the mandatory power of the legislature to elect. This language clearly is only intended to give State executives a right to keep the Senate full by appointments, and nothing more.

"Again, the next clause says, 'that the Senator shall be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen'—not appointed. In section 4 it is provided again:

"'The times and places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.'

"In every mention in the Constitution of the creation of Senators but one an election is contemplated."

It is claimed that the right of a State executive to fill a Senatorial vacancy which occurs during a legislative session or during a recess of a legislature, where the legislature has foreseen the vacancy and has failed to fill it, should be assimilated to the right now claimed and exercised by the President under section 2, Article II, of the Constitution. This section provides as follows:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Various Attorneys-General have held under this provision that, where an office became vacant during a session of the Senate and the Senate adjourned before it had been filled, the power of the President to appoint still continued. We submit, however, that this construction has never been placed on the clause of the Constitution now under consideration, and, further, that there is a marked distinction between the cases of Presidential appointments and the appointment of Senators by State executives. In the appointment of administrative officers of the United States the power under the Constitution is primarily with the President. The Senate is simply an advisory and consenting body. In the case of the selection of Senators the responsibility is cast primarily on the legislatures of the States. The composition of the Senate is based upon the theory that the people of the States act through their legislatures. We confidently assert, therefore, that there is no analogy between the subordinate right of State executives in the case of Senators and the primary right of the President in the matter of the appointment of administrative officers of the Government.

In discussing the clause of the Constitution now under consideration we have recognized the New Hampshire cases, which are hereinafter explained, as establishing the proposition that where, under changes in a State constitution, the legislature which is charged with the duty of filling a regular term can not meet until after its commencement, the executive can make a temporary appointment. But we think that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated nor intended to provide for a case where a State, by its own deliberate act should deprive its legislature of the power to fill an entire term at its beginning. In our opinion they never intended to give the executive of a State the power to fill an entire term by original appointment, unless, possibly, in a case where the legislature had chosen and the person elected had refused to accept or died before qualification. In other words, we conclude that the power of appointment was not to be exercised unless the vacancy occurred in the recess of the legislature and was occasioned by some casualty like death or resignation. This view has been maintained by many of the ablest constitutional lawyers who have occupied seats in this body, notably by the present junior Senator from Missouri, Mr. Vest. In his remarks in one of the New Hampshire cases (the Blair case, Senate Election Cases, p. 37) he said among other things:

"I voted on the Bell case that Mr. Bell was not entitled to a seat in this body; that the governor of a State had no right to fill an entire term by original appointment; that the meaning of the Constitution, which declares 'if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State' the executive authority of a State may make a temporary appointment, is that when a vacancy shall occur, not by operation of law, but by some event which applies to the individual asking for the office or applying for admission into this body, by the resignation of a person, by death operating upon him, and that the word 'otherwise' in that connection means by similar casualty—when a vacancy shall happen, when it shall occur, not by operation of statute or of any constitution, but when it occurs by resignation, death, or otherwise.

"The terms of the Constitution as originally made—and I shall be very brief in the discussion of the subject, for I only propose to give my own reasons for casting my vote—the terms of the Constitution are:

"'If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy.'

"There are three clauses in the Federal Constitution in which the word 'happen' is used. First, in Article II, section 2, the Constitution says:

"'The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.'

"Article I, section 2, provides:

"'When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.'

"Article I, section 3, which is the clause now under discussion, provides:

"'And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"In all three of these clauses the word 'happen' is used, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the first two clauses in regard to vacancies in the House of Representatives and vacancies during a recess of the Senate as to executive officers, the word 'happen' is without limitation 'where vacancies shall happen,' and there is the termination of the power of the President in regard to Executive appointments; but in regard to Senators the Federal convention put a limitation upon the word 'happen.' They did not stop with declaring where vacancies may happen during a recess of a legislature that then the governor may appoint, but where a vacancy shall happen by resignation or otherwise.

"If the Senators now present are correct who claim the power of a governor to exist to appoint in these cases, we are forced to the conclusion that the words 'by resignation or otherwise' are void and meaningless as used by the framers of the Constitution, or else that the terms are a limitation upon the word 'happen.' They are not found in the other two clauses of the Constitution. What makes this argument more significant and conclusive to my mind is that the original draft of the Constitution, which I have before me, and the debates show that the clause as originally reported to the convention of 1787 was absolute and unlimited when a vacancy should occur, and Mr. Madison moved to put in these terms of limitation, that where the vacancy should occur by resignation or otherwise, or equivalent terms, then the governor of the State might appoint."

We come now to the consideration of the reported cases where the Senate has passed on questions involving the power of State executives to supply vacancies by temporary appointment.

The first case is that of Kensey Johns, of Delaware, which was decided on March 28, 1794. As reported in Taft's Election Cases, pages 1 and 2, the cases was as follows:

"George Read, a Senator from Delaware, resigned his seat in December, 1793, during the recess of the legislature of said State. The legislature met in January and adjourned in February, 1794. On the 19th of March Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy. It was determined that Mr. Johns was not entitled to his seat, a session of the legislature having intervened between the resignation of Mr. Read and the appointment of Mr. Johns."

There were five members of the Federal Convention who were members of the Senate when this case was acted on. Four of them voted against the right of claimant to said seat and one voted in his favor. This fact should be persuasive of how the framers of the Constitution understood and construed the clause of the Constitution now under consideration.

The next case is that of Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, which was disposed of on March 4, 1801. (Senate Election Cases, p. 3.) Mr. Tracy's first term expired March 3, 1801. On March 4, at a special session of the Senate, he produced credentials of appointment by the governor of Connecticut to fill the vacancy. It appeared from the credentials, which were dated February 20, 1801, that the legislature was not then in session and that he was appointed to serve from March 3, 1801, until the next meeting of the legislature. Exceptions were taken to his credentials, but he was admitted to his seat by a vote of 13 to 10. It will be seen that in this case the vacancy occurred during a recess of the legislature and that the legislature had had no opportunity to fill it after it occurred.

Then comes the case of Samuel Smith, of Maryland, which was decided on June 6, 1809. Senate Election Cases, p. 4.) The facts of this case were as follows: On the expiration of Mr. Smith's first term, March 3, 1809, the legislature of Maryland not having elected his successor and not then being in session, he was appointed by the governor on March 4, 1809, to fill the vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature, which would take place on June 5 next thereafter. It will thus be seen that the facts in the Smith case were the same as those in the Tracy case. That is to say, the vacancy occurred during a recess of the legislature at the beginning of a term, because the legislature which should have filled the vacancy failed to do so. The right of Mr. Smith to take his seat under the appointment seems not to have been contested. The only question determined was whether the appointment would or would not cease on the first day of the meeting of the next legislature. The Senate held that Mr. Smith was entitled to hold his seat during the next session of the legislature unless said legislature should fill such vacancy and the Senate be officially informed thereof.

The cases of Mr. Tracy and Mr. Smith, taken together, decided that where a legislature, whose duty it was to elect a successor to a Senator whose term of office was about to expire, adjourned before the expiration of said term without electing the successor, the executive might then appoint and the appointee would not simply hold his seat until the next meeting of the legislature, but during the next session of the legislature or until that session of the legislature filled the vacancy. If it adjourned without doing so, then the appointee's right to his seat would cease. It will thus be seen that these cases do not help Mr. Quay, for in each of them the vacancy occurred during a recess of the legislature, and the legislature had had no opportunity of filling the vacancy between the date of its occurrence and the time of the appointment.

The next case is that of James Lanman, of Connecticut. This case was disposed of in March, 1825. (Senate Election Cases, pp. 5 and 6.) Mr. Lanman's term expired on March 3, 1825. On March 4, 1825, he produced credentials of appointment by the governor to fill the vacancy. The credentials were dated February 8, 1825, and set forth that the President had desired the Senate to convene on March 4, 1825, and had caused official notice of that fact to be communicated to the governor. The credentials were to take effect immediately after March 3, 1825, and to continue until the next meeting of the legislature. According to the report of the committee on this case, as contained in Niles Weekly Register, volume 28, page 32, the credentials further showed that at the time of their execution "the legislature of the State was not in session and would not be until the month of May."

Exceptions being taken, the credentials were referred to a committee, who reported the facts as above stated. On motion, Mr. Lanman was denied his seat. It will thus be seen that the facts in the Lanman case were identical with the facts in the Tracy case and identical with the facts in the Smith case, with the exception that in the Smith case the appointment was not made until the vacancy had occurred. In the Tracy and Lanman cases the appointments were made before the vacancies occurred. Otherwise the three cases are similar. It is said that the Lanman case may have been decided upon the ground that the executive could not properly make the appointment in anticipation before the vacancy occurred. We do not coincide in this view. First, because under this view Mr. Tracy should have been denied his seat; and second, because we can find nowhere in the earlier reported cases any doubts suggested as to the validity of an appointment by an executive on the ground that it was made before the vacancy actually occurred if the appointment was otherwise valid. In our opinion the decision in the Lanman case rested upon the fact that the legislature of the State had had full opportunity to fill the vacancy before it actually occurred and had failed to do so. This will more clearly appear from the report of the committee in the next case to be considered, that of Ambrose H. Sevier, of Arkansas.

The Sevier case was considered and decided in February and March, 1837. (Senate Election Cases, pp. 7 and 8.) The facts were as follows:

"The State of Arkansas was admitted into the Union in June, 1836. In October, 1836, the legislature of that State elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators. On the allotment of the Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, Mr. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1837. The legislature of Arkansas had no opportunity to fill the vacancy, not having been in session after the result of the allotment was known in that State. January 17, 1837, the governor of Arkansas appointed Mr. Sevier to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. At the special session of the Senate in March the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee reported that as the time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot, and as the legislature, not being in session after this decision, could not supply the vacancy, it came 'fairly within the provision of the Constitution contained in the third section of the first article, which declares, "and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise," etc.,' and reported a resolution that the oath required by the Constitution be administered to him. March 8 this resolution passed and Mr. Sevier took his seat."

Mr. Grundy, of Tennessee, made the report in this case. In the course of the report he referred to the Lanman case and the distinction between it and the Sevier case in the following language:

"In looking into the practice of the Senate upon the subject of executive appointments, no case like the present has been found. Several cases have occurred in which the executives of different States in anticipation of the expiration of the regular term of service have appointed Senators (the legislature not being in session), and in all of these cases the Senators thus appointed were admitted to their seats until the called session of the Senate in March, 1825, when Mr. Lanman, of Connecticut, whose term of office expired on the 3d of March, 1825, produced his credentials from the governor of Connecticut, and the Senate decided he was not entitled to his seat by a vote of 23 to 18.

"This decision seems to have been generally acquiesced in since that time; nor is it intended by this committee to call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is that the legislature of a State by making elections themselves shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods; and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution.'

"The case now under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office under his election made by the legislature of Arkansas was decided by lot, agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution on that subject. After the decision thus made, the legislature of Arkansas, not being in session, could not supply the vacancy; and the case, in the opinion of the committee, comes fairly within the provisions of the Constitution contained in the third section of the first article, which declares, "and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

It will thus be seen that Mr. Grundy understood the Lanman case to have been decided upon the principle announced above.

The next case was that of Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, which was before the Senate on February 4, 5, and 7, 1851. (Senate Election Cases, pp. 10–12.)

"Mr. Winthrop was appointed July 27, 1850, to fill a vacancy in the Senate happening by the resignation of Daniel Webster. February 1, 1851, Robert Rantoul was elected by the legislature to fill the unexpired term. February 4, Mr. Rantoul not having appeared to take the seat, Mr. Winthrop offered a resolution, which was agreed to, "That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire and report to the Senate, as early as practicable, at what period the term of service of a Senator appointed by the executive of a State during the recess of the legislature thereof rightfully expires." The committee reported that a person so appointed had a right to the seat until the legislature, at its next meeting, should elect a person to fill the unexpired term, and the person elected should accept, and his acceptance appear to the Senate; that presentation of credentials implied acceptance; that these views were sustained by the precedents. The report was debated, but no action taken, the whole subject was laid on the table," because, on February 7, 1851, Mr. Rantoul's credentials were presented, and Mr. Winthrop thereupon vacated the seat.

The next case is that of Archibald Dixon, of Kentucky, which was before the Senate in December, 1852. (Senate Election Cases, pp. 13–15.) The facts of this case were as follows: On December 17, 1851, Henry Clay was a Senator from Kentucky, chosen by the legislature for a term of six years, which expired on March 3, 1855. Being so a Senator, he resigned by a communication to the legislature, declaring that it was to take effect on the first Monday in September, 1852. The legislature then being in session, received the resignation, and chose Mr. Dixon to fill the vacancy thus to occur from the first Monday in September, 1852, to March 3, 1855. The legislature then adjourned. On June 29, 1852, during a recess of the legislature, Mr. Clay died, and the governor of Kentucky made a temporary appointment of Mr. Meriwether as a Senator from Kentucky to hold the seat until the first Monday in September, 1852, the date on which Mr. Clay's resignation was to take effect. Mr. Meriwether immediately took the vacant seat and held it until Congress adjourned on the last day of August, 1852. On the reassembling of Congress, December 6, 1852, Mr. Meriwether did not appear, and Mr. Dixon appeared and presented his credentials.

Objection was made to Mr. Dixon's taking the oath of office on the ground that the seat still belonged to Mr. Meriwether, the point being that Mr. Meriwether had been appointed to fill a vacancy happening by the death of a Senator and he had a right to the seat until the next meeting of the legislature, and that it was not in the power of the governor to limit the term of office until the first Monday in September, 1852, the day on which Mr. Clay had declared his resignation was to become operative. The Senate held that Mr. Meriwether's right to the seat expired on the first Monday in September, 1852, and that thereafter Mr. Dixon was entitled to it.

This case establishes several principles. The first and most important is that if, while the legislature is in session, a Senator tenders his resignation to take effect at a date which will be subsequent to the adjournment of the legislature, the legislature can fill the vacancy which is to thus begin after its adjournment. This carries out the paramount idea and intention of the convention, already mentioned, to have the Senate kept filled with Senators chosen by the legislatures. The second principle established is that a Senator's resignation can take effect in futuro; and the third is that if the Senator, after having so resigned, dies before the date fixed for the consummation of the resignation, the legislature not then being in session, the governor can appoint. This case, in all its aspects, is adverse to the claims of Mr. Quay.

The next case is that of Samuel S. Phelps, of Vermont, which was debated in the Senate from January to March, 1854, and was finally disposed of on March 16, 1854. (Senate Election Cases, pp. 16–18.)

"Mr. Phelps was appointed by the governor of Vermont January 17, 1853, during the recess of the legislature to fill a vacancy in the Senate happening by the death of William Upham. His credentials were presented, and he took his seat January 19. The legislature met in October and adjourned in December without electing a Senator to fill the unexpired term. Mr. Phelps had held the seat during the remainder of the second session of the Thirty-second Congress, ending March 3, and during the special session of the Senate March 4 to April 11. December 29 he again attended. January 4, 1854, the Senate resolved that the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether he was entitled to retain his seat. January 16 the committee reported the resolution 'that the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to his seat in the United States Senate.' It was accompanied by a minority report adverse to the right of Mr. Phelps to a seat. March 16 the resolution reported by the committee was rejected by a vote of 12 yeas to 26 nays, and it was 'Resolved, That the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is not entitled to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States.' "

The resolution of inquiry, referred to above, was submitted by Mr. Seward, and was in the following language:

"Whereas the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps was appointed by his excellency the governor of Vermont, in the recess of the legislature of that State, to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States which had happened by the death of the Hon. William Upham, a Senator whose term of six years would have continued until the 4th day of March, 1855; and

"Whereas it is understood that since that temporary appointment was made the legislature of Vermont has been convened at their annual session and has adjourned without filling such vacancy: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether the Hon. Samuel S. Phelps is entitled to retain his seat in the Senate of the United States."

This case was very fully considered by the committee and by the Senate. As will be seen, Mr. Phelps was denied his seat because, between the date of his temporary appointment and the action of the Senate, the legislature of Vermont had convened and adjourned without filling the vacancy.

The case of Jared W. Williams, of New Hampshire, was before the Senate in July and August, 1854, was, in substance, the same as the case of Mr. Phelps explained above, and was decided in the same way.

The cases of Charles H. Bell and Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, which were before the Senate in 1879 and 1885, respectively, may be considered together. (Senate Election Cases, pp. 26–47.) Each of these appointments was made to fill a vacancy at the commencement of a full term. The act of Congress of July 25, 1866, as will be remembered, provides that "the legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress," etc. In 1878 the constitution of New Hampshire was changed so that its biennial legislatures were chosen in November, but were not allowed to meet in session until the following June. Thus in each of these cases the legislatures which, under the act of 1866, were bound to fill these vacancies had no opportunity to do so until some three months after they occurred. Under these circumstances it was decided that the governor had the right to make temporary appointments for this period of time. We thus see that in these cases the legislature had never had an opportunity to fill the vacancies which were supplied by temporary appointment by the governor.

In the case of Horace Chilton, of Texas, disposed of in January, 1892, and reported in Senate Election Cases (pp. 48–51), Mr. Reagan, an elected Senator from the State of Texas for a term of six years, resigned his office and the resignation was to take effect June 10, 1891. The executive of Texas, after the receipt of the resignation of Mr. Reagan and on April 25, 1891, appointed Mr. Chilton to supply the vacancy. The certificate recited that the appointment was to take effect June 10, 1891. The only point decided was whether the governor had the right to appoint in advance. The decision was in the affirmative. The legislature had never had an opportunity to fill this vacancy.

Again, and finally, we can consider the cases of Lee Mantle, of Montana; John B. Allen, of Washington; A. C. Beckwith, of Wyoming, and Henry W. Corbett, of Oregon, together, the first three being before the Senate in 1893 and the last in 1898. All of these were appointments to supply vacancies of regular or full terms. In the cases of Mantle, Beckwith, and Corbett the legislatures which should have filled the vacancies had met and adjourned without doing so. In the Allen case the legislature was in session on the 4th of March, the date the new term commenced, and remained in session until the 9th of that month, and Mr. Allen was appointed on the 10th. In each of the cases the claimants were refused seats, or, to state it more correctly, the claimants in the Mantle, Corbett, and Allen cases were refused seats, and the Beckwith case was not pressed to a vote, Mr. Beckwith having abandoned his claim.

It will be noticed that the facts in the Allen case are identical with those in the Quay case.

The statement of these cases and precedents shows that from the beginning of the Government down to the present time the Senate has never recognized the right of a State executive to make a temporary appointment where the vacancy happened or occurred during a session of the legislature. It shows, further, that for seventy-five years the Senate has refused to recognize the right of a State executive to make a temporary appointment, even where the vacancy happened or occurred during a recess of the legislature, if the legislature, either before or after it occurred and prior to the date of the appointment, had had an opportunity to fill it.

The fundamental principle thus established is that if the legislature, either before or after the happening of a vacancy, has had an opportunity to fill it, then there is no power in the State executive to appoint. The result is fatal to the claims of Mr. Quay. No danger or evil has resulted to the Government from the enforcement of this principle.

We therefore submit that the Senate, for its own honor and dignity, should stand by its previous solemn and deliberate decisions, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania."

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

Matthew S. Quay claims to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from Pennsylvania by virtue of an appointment by the governor of that Commonwealth, dated April 21, 1899. Mr. Quay had held the seat for the term ending March 4, 1899, by election of the legislature.

The legislature who were authorized to elect his successor met on the 3d day of January, 1899, and adjourned without such election on the 20th day of April, 1899. The Constitution of the United States provides (sec. 3, Art. I):

"If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The constitution of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania provides (sec. 4, Art. II):

"In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this Commonwealth, in a recess between sessions, the governor shall convene the two houses, by proclamation on notice not exceeding sixty days, to fill the same."

It is claimed that the governor under this provision of the constitution was bound to call the legislature together forthwith. It is admitted that this was not done. It is claimed, therefore, that the effect of this failure was to deprive the governor of the power of appointment, if any, conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States. We are unable to accept this view.

First. It seems to us that it was a fair question whether the governor was bound to call the legislature together at once in all cases, without discretion. For instance, if the vacancy had occurred so near the time for a regular session that it would be inconvenient and not worth while to anticipate it, or if the legislature had just adjourned without effecting a choice and the governor felt reasonably certain that it would be impossible to effect an election if they were assembled, it might be fairly claimed that he was not bound to issue a call from which no practical result of any value would be likely to come. It might well be that no session of the Senate of the United States was likely to take place in which a person chosen could take a seat before the regular time of assembling the legislature. Now, the question whether the governor had a discretion in any case or whether the injunction of the State constitution is absolute and peremptory is one which the governor must decide, and we can not, it seems to us, hold that an erroneous decision on his part would deprive the State of Pennsylvania of its right to be represented in the Senate in a constitutional way. It seems to us that this clause of the constitution of Pennsylvania must of necessity be interpreted by the authority in Pennsylvania charged with its execution, and that the Senate of the United States can not go behind the judgment of that officer in regard to its meaning and application.

Second. It seems to us that, whatever may have been the duty of the executive of Pennsylvania, the constitution of Pennsylvania itself can have no effect upon the lawful appointment of a Senator of the United States. That is provided for by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States declares that the governor may appoint under certain circumstances. It declares also that "this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." So if there be such a vacancy as is described in the Constitution, the Constitution providing that in such case the governor may appoint, a provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania that he shall not appoint or that he shall do something else, can not have the effect to deprive him of his power under any circumstances.

We are left, therefore, to the consideration of the meaning of the provision of the Constitution of the United States above cited. This question, in our judgment, is a very simple one. Does the language of the Constitution of the United States mean just what the constitution of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania says: "In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator in a recess between sessions," or does it mean that the vacancy must be one which comes by chance, so that it does not apply at all to the case of a vacancy at the beginning of a term, which does not come by chance but is foreseen and inevitable? If the words have the former meaning, then all distinctions between cases where a legislature has been in session and those where a legislature has not been in session, between vacancies at the beginning of a term and vacancies beginning after the term itself has begun and the office for that term once filled, are without importance. We think that the former is the true meaning of the Constitution. We think that it was the intent of the Constitution to provide, as far as possible, that every State should have two Senators.

First. The constitutional convention hesitated between conferring the power of appointing Senators upon the executive and the legislature of the State in the beginning. Like the legislature, the executive of the State was supposed to represent the will of the people. Under the constitutional arrangements then existing, he appointed all State officers and appointed judges, who held their office for life. So there is no reason to suppose that they considered the executive an unfit instrument for such appointment. And they settled the question by giving the power of permanent appointment to the legislature, and of temporary appointment to the executive.

Second. We can conceive no reason likely to have influenced the framers of the Constitution for making a distinction between cases of vacancy occurring in one way or at one time and vacancies occurring in any other way or at any other time. The office of Senator may be at any time of infinite importance to the interests of a State. Upon a single vote may often depend and sometimes has depended the fate of measures which would bring prosperity or misery into every workshop and almost every family in Pennsylvania. We do not believe that when the Constitution was enacted it would have occurred to anybody that if a Senator died within a week of the adjournment of the legislature, or at a time when there were three parties in the legislature who could not agree, or at a time when the two houses who formerly made an election by concurrent vote were of ways of thinking in politics so different that they could not be reconciled, that the State must remain unrepresented until a new legislature should be chosen.

They meant, as we believe, that for the interest of the State and the interest of the whole country the Senate should always be full, so far as they could devise a constitutional mechanism to accomplish that purpose. The debates in the convention show, it seems to us, that such was the understanding of all the members. There is not the slightest suggestion of any distinction in the kind of vacancies which may be filled by the executive of the State. It is spoken of only as a scheme for filling vacancies without exception or qualification. Mr. Ellsworth says:

"It is only said that the executive may supply vacancies. When the legislative meeting happens to be near, the power will not be exerted. As there will be but two members from a State, vacancies may be of great moment."

It will be noted that Mr. Ellsworth uses the word "happen" in reference to a fixed and foreseen event, viz, the time of the meeting of a State legislature. Mr. Williamson says: "Senators may resign or not accept. This provision, is, therefore, absolutely necessary," showing that it was in his mind that a vancancy occurring at the beginning of a term, when a Senator refused to accept, was within the contemplation of the Constitution.

Mr. Madison then (and it will be observed he is in this instance reporting his own remarks and his own purpose) says:

"Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies" and insert the words "happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise."'

From this, in our judgment, it clearly appears that the words which it is now claimed qualify the universal words "vacancies shall be supplied by the executive" were inserted for the distinct purpose and the only purpose of rendering it clear that a person elected could lawfully refuse to accept, and that a Senator could resign. Mr. Gouverneur Morris declares the same reason. He says:

"This is absolutely necessary. Otherwise, as members chosen into the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it would be in the power of the legislature, by appointing a man Senator against his consent, to deprive the United States of his services."

Now, can it be believed that language which, as its author states, was used for this purpose was intended to accomplish a much more important and totally different purpose, by providing that the executive might appoint in some cases but not in others, and a motion supported by Mr. Ellsworth with the argument that as there will be but two members from a State vacancies may be of great consequence, was intended to provide, in substance, that a large number of vacancies should not be filled at all?

Mr. Rutledge's report of the committee of detail, made in the convention August 6, 1787, was under discussion when Madison's amendment was adopted. The provision there was: "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature." So the committee of detail, consisting of Messrs. Rutledge, Randolph, Gorham, Ellsworth, and Wilson, were, as it appears, unanimously of opinion that the clause should read, "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," and that view was supported by the argument that it was exceedingly important that every State should always have its full representation; and then the language was changed to read as it is now for the sole purpose, so far as was avowed, of affirming the right of a Senator to resign or decline.

So it seems to us clear that the convention meant to use language which should give the executive this power whenever a vacancy exists.

The next question is, Did they use apt language to convey that meaning? If it be true that the phrase used is a phrase which is commonly used as synonymous with "occur," "happen to exist," "exist," if it happen that there be a vacancy, then the case is made out. Now, we affirm with great confidence that the phrase used in the Constitution is employed in ordinary usage to describe events that do not depend upon chance, and to describe a continuing condition without reference to the time or method of its origin. If the Fourth of July happen on Sunday, the coming of Sunday and the coming of the Fourth of July, the coincidence of those two things, is the result of fixed and unchangeable natural laws; and that word expresses not merely the beginning of the Fourth of July, or the beginning of Sunday, but the continued identity of the two periods of time described throughout their entire length. Indeed, the word "coincidence" is equivalent to the words "happening at the same time," and is used to describe events that are not fortuitous. "Incido" means "to happen" and it also means "to exist." Our lexicographers, Webster and Worcester, and the Century Dictionary, all give as one of the meanings of the word "happen," "occur." The English translation of the Scriptures, which is our standard of good usage, in the twenty-second verse of the forty-first chapter of Isaiah, "Shew us what shall happen," is intended to include everything that is to take place hereafter. It applies to everything that is to exist in the future. And the text goes on to explain what is meant, for it adds, "Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know," etc. The Century Dictionary states that the word "happen" is equivalent to "it may be."

In the debate on the Sevier case in the Senate in 1836, John Quincy Adams said he believed, in relation to offices, that every one happens to be vacant which is not full, and that he believed was the meaning and sense of the Constitution, whether the vacancy occurred from casualty, the regular course of events, expiration of term, or other cause.

This construction is fortified by the consideration that the same phrase is used in two other places in the Constitution, where it is now well settled that the words "if a vacancy happen" mean what we think they mean here, viz, "if a vacancy happen to exist." The Constitution provides that "the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may, at any time, by law make or alter such regulations." The further provision is: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Now, that phrase has been uniformly held, as we suppose, without question to include all vacancies, whenever they begin and from whatever conditions they are produced. It is the only authority given to the executive of the State on the subject; and yet, in the old days, where a majority of votes was required to elect, the executive always, and in some cases repeatedly, in relation to the same vacancy, issued his writ under this constitutional power. It made no difference whether it occurred by chance or in the beginning of a term or by death or expulsion.

The phrase "when vacancies happen" means "whenever there are vacancies." Now, it is true this phrase is not limited by the words "during the recess of the legislature." But if, when the word "happen" is used without limitation, it applies to every occasion and to the whole time when there is a vacancy, surely the words "if vacancies happen during the recess of the legislature" apply to every recess, to the whole recess, and to all the time when, under whatever conditions or from whatever causes, there is a vacancy during any recess. It will be noticed also that the Constitution speaks in terms of a single State—"if vacancies happen during the recess of the legislature of any State," and it provides, "the executive may make temporary appointments"—not may make a single appointment. It would seem from this language that the Constitution had in mind the possibility of repeated appointments by the executive.

Again, the provision for appointing executive officers has been held, in accordance with the opinion of Attorneys-General Taney, Wirt, and Devens, and the opinion and practice, we suppose, of every President of the United States from the beginning, to mean the same thing.

The provision is:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Now, it is well settled that if an official die during the session of the Senate, and the office is not filled before adjournment, the President, under this clause, may appoint in vacation. If a new office be created by act of Congress during a session, the President may appoint persons to fill it, after the Senate has adjourned, during the recess. In other words, the words "all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate" mean "whenever there is a vacancy during the recess of the Senate." It is inconceivable that the convention intended in the use of the same language a simple general provision in one case and a provision to be applied fettered by refinements and distinctions and with large exceptions in another case. It was said in argument at the hearing that this view had never been accepted by the Senate, but that claim is in conflict with the uniform history of the country for more than a generation.

The Senate and the House of Representatives not only have for many years let such appointments pass without question or remonstrance, but they provide salaries for officers so appointed, and, what is more emphatic still, as an expression of their assent and approval they create at almost every session of Congress new offices which they expect when they are created will be filled for the first time by the President in vacation. The uniform course of our legislation establishes the construction that when a new office is created by law on the 1st of February and no action is taken by the President until after the 4th of March, when Congress adjourns, the words in the Constitution "all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate" are uniformly held to describe exactly that case.

Further, the language of the very clause in question can not be construed as the opponents of Mr. Quay would construe it, or in any other way than the undersigned construe it, without destroying its own purpose. If there be no power in the executive of Pennsylvania to appoint a successor to Mr. Quay under this clause of the Constitution, there is no power in the legislature to choose such successor until the end of the term; and in every case where a Senator dies or resigns, where the legislature is not in session, or where, after such death or resignation, the legislature has met and adjourned without a choice, or wherever, at the beginning of a term, the vacancy remains unfilled, it must remain unfilled until the end of the six years, according to the logic of the majority of the committee. The Constitution confers upon the legislature—

First. The power to elect Senators for six years—not for five years or for four years or for two years. Having made that provision, which relates solely to the full term, as its express language clearly indicates, then comes the provision with which we are now dealing:

"If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The vacancy which an executive might fill in vacation is the only vacancy which the legislature can fill when it meets. So that those persons who maintain the theory we are dealing with must either hold that the legislature of Pennsylvania can not, when it meets, elect a Senator, or must admit that the governor lawfully appointed Mr. Quay.

We find, then, a clear purpose on the part of our Constitutional Convention to provide that all vacancies shall be filled by the executive when no legislature is in session, apt language and language clearly adapted to that purpose introduced without objection in the Constitutional Convention, accompanied by the statement of Oliver Ellsworth of the great importance that no vacancy should be left unfilled, a change in that language on Mr. Madison's motion for the purpose avowed by him of removing a doubt as to the right of a Senator to resign or a Senator-elect to decline, and no suggestion anywhere of a purpose of limiting the power of the executive or making any exception to it.

We find next that the language newly inserted by Mr. Madison is language employed in ordinary usage to express the same meaning, and that it is employed to express the same meaning in the same Constitution in two other important instances, both being instances where vacancies in public offices are to be filled.

We find next that the purpose of the Constitution that there should be a Senate consisting of two members from each State will be interfered with and interrupted by the construction which denies the power to the executive to fill all vacancies whatever when there is no legislature. If that construction prevail, there must be frequently an interruption in the Senatorial office, and States must frequently be left without representation or with only partial representation in the Senate. It is unnecessary to dwell on the importance of a single vote in a body consisting, in the beginning, of but twenty-two Senators, and now consisting of but ninety. In many important instances great measures have been determined by the casting vote of the Vice-President, which would have failed if there had been a single vacant seat. Instances have been very numerous indeed of important amendments which changed, or if they had passed would have changed, the character of great measures of legislation whose fate has been determined by a single vote. In Massachusetts a governor has twice been elected by a majority of one—in one year in the popular vote, in another year in the legislature.

It is said that if the legislature has been in session after a vacancy and has failed to fill it the State is in fault; that the legislature has neglected its duty, and so it is not unjust that the State should suffer. There are two answers to this argument: First, that it is for the interest of the whole people that every State should be fully represented; and, second, that there is no fault to be imputed to the legislature of a State or to the people, where a majority vote is required, if there be a failure to elect. Will anybody claim that the case of a failure to elect a President for want of a constitutional majority, a case provided for by conferring a power upon the House of Representatives voting by States, is the case of fault or negligence on the part of the people? If there be three parties holding different opinions in regard to great policies which affect the interest, the honor, or the destiny of the Republic, and neither party can conscientiously surrender its honest convictions and aid in the establishment of a policy which it believes iniquitous or destructive, that is no fault and no neglect. It is inevitable from the constitution of human nature.

In the beginning, the universal practice was to elect members of the House of Representatives only by a majority of the entire vote cast, and to elect Senators by a concurrent vote of two bodies who must agree to produce a result. It seems to us no valid reason can be given for supposing that if the two houses of a State legislature, before the statute of 1866, failed to agree, the framers of the Constitution thought that it would be a just punishment that the State should be deprived of its equal voice in the Senate, or in case of an election on joint ballot, in later years, that there were three parties instead of two, so that there could be no majority, the State should be so punished. The cases where there are great political differences about public measures are few in comparison with the nonpartisan questions which come before the Senate, and the special interests of a State are much more likely to be affected by the latter than by the former.

It is said that if there be a vacancy and the legislature meet and adjourn without filling it, if the power of appointment exist in the governor, there will be likely to be intrigue on the part of the executive or his political friends, so as to prevent a choice, and to enable him to appoint his favorite. But there is not the slightest historical evidence that any such idea occurred to the framers of the Constitution. It seems to us to be a refinement which they never would have considered, and which never should be considered by anybody in framing a constitution. Such intrigues can only be successful if they have the aid of some considerable political party. They would be quite as likely to desire to put over an election by which the office is to be permanently filled, whether the governor were to have power to fill the vacancy temporarily or no. Such intrigues, in the few cases where they are possible, will be as likely to happen under one arrangement as under the other. But our constitutional arrangements are based, and must be based, on the theory that the executives chosen by the people will be, in general, upright, honorable, and conscientious men, to whom such motives would be foreign and abhorrent.

These words, then, do not mean that the vacancy must come by accident when the legislature is not in session. Do they mean that the vacancy must begin when the legislature is not in session? There is a meaning, unquestionably, that may be given to the language which lends plausibility to the claim that it must be a fortuitous vacancy, although that claim is abundantly overthrown by the fact that the words are used frequently in our language in the other sense, that they are used twice in the Constitution in the other sense, and that the purpose of the Constitution would be defeated if they were not used in the other sense. But there is no such argument in favor of the construction that the words "if a vacancy happen" mean "if a vacancy begin." If the legislature adjourn on the 4th of March and do not meet again until the 1st of December, certainly a vacancy happens all through that interval, and there can be no reasoning that is not strained and far-fetched which can lead anybody to suppose that if a Senator died on the 3d of March and the legislature adjourn on the 4th that it was the intention of the Constitution that the State should be left unrepresented.

The Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Turley, in an able speech on the Corbett case, made in the Senate February 25, 1898, quoted with great effect the following language of Mr. Webster:

"The Constitution utters its behests in the name and by authority of the people, and does not exact from States any plighted public faith to maintain it. On the contrary, it makes its own preservation depend on individual duty and individual obligation. Sir, the States can not omit to appoint Senators and electors. It is not a matter resting in State discretion or State pleasure.

"The Constitution has taken better care of its own preservation. It lays its hand on individual conscience and individual duty. It incapacitates any man to sit in the legislature of a State who shall not have first taken his solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States as they are to support their own State constitution. Nay, sir, they are as solemnly sworn to support it as we ourselves are, who are members of Congress.

"No member of a State legislature can refuse to proceed, at the proper time, to elect Senators to Congress or to provide for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President any more than the members of this Senate can refuse, when the appointed day arrives, to meet the members of the other House to count the votes for those officers and ascertain who are chosen. In both cases the duty binds, and with equal strength, the conscience of the individual member, and it is imposed on all by an oath in the same words.

"Let it, then, never be said, sir, that it is a matter of discretion with the States whether they will continue the Government or break it up by refusing to appoint Senators and to elect electors. They have no discretion in the matter. The members of their legislatures can not avoid during either, so often as the time arrives, without a direct violation of their duty and their oaths—such a violation as would break up any other government."

That language seems to the undersigned a great reenforcement of their position. If it be true, and it is true, as Mr. Webster says, that the States can not omit to appoint Senators; that it is not a matter resting in State discretion or State pleasure; that the Constitution has taken better care of its own preservation and lays its hand on individual conscience and individual duty, then it seems to us impossible to believe that the Constitution has not provided a method of filling vacancies when the legislative power fails. It is individual conscience and individual duty on which the great expounder of the Constitution declares the Constitution lays its hand. But it is clear that individual conscience and individual duty must be totally inadequate to keep the seats in the Senate full, except as they are the conscience and the duty of the executive. The legislative power is never exercised by an individual. It could formerly only be exercised by the concurrent action of two bodies, each containing many individuals, each with a separate conscience, each with its own view of duty, which in many cases it will be found impossible to reconcile. Many instances have occurred in our history when a State legislature could not elect a Senator unless many of its members should cast their vote in gross violation of conscience and duty. And it was for that case, as well as other cases of vacancy, that it was the purpose of the Constitution to provide.

It is not the ending of the term; it is not the failure of the legislature to elect; it is not the fact that the legislature has been in session after the vacancy began and has failed to elect, but the absence from the office of any person authorized to fill it to which the word "happen," which expresses contingency, is applied. It is certain that terms will end. It is quite probable that there will be many cases when legislatures can not elect. It is quite likely that Senators will die or resign, or that Senators-elect will decline. In all these contingencies, described by the comprehensive word "happen," the constitutional mandate that each State shall have two Senators is in force and there is a simple provision for its execution by authorizing the executive to fill the vacancy.

It remains only to consider the precedents set by the Senate in dealing with like cases.

In our judgment the decisions of the Senate made heretofore do not present any obstacle to the decision of this case on its merits and by the simple rule of the Constitution, as we understand it. We think the weight of those decisions tends to establish the construction for which we contend. They are somewhat in conflict with each other, and in some cases it is difficult to know on what grounds they proceed. While great weight is to be given to a judgment of the Senate reached on careful consideration and debate, yet it is obvious that in determining how far they are to control later cases, very different considerations exist from those which apply to ordinary courts. They do not affect property which may have been acquired in consequence of a belief that the former decisions contain a rule of law which will stand. They do not involve penal consequences as do decisions which expound criminal laws. If the clear meaning of the Constitution be what we believe it to be, no harm can happen to anybody if it be so declared. The only result will be that States which otherwise would be left unrepresented will have their full constitutional representation without an interval.

It is also true that frequently political or personal considerations enter into the votes of a political body, even into the votes of the Senate, which very seldom find admission into courts of justice, and unhappily such considerations have been in the past sometimes frankly avowed by Senators who have yielded to them, and the political opinions of contestants for seats in this body have had an influence on the judges of elections which has sometimes determined the vote in election cases. But, beyond all cavil or question, no such consideration entered into the fully discussed and carefully considered cases of Mr. Bell and Mr. Blair and Mr. Marston, where it was held that the executive can appoint in case of a vacancy at the beginning of the term, and that the word "happen" used in the Constitution does not mean "occur accidentally," but means "exist," and that the words "if vacancies happen" and the words "if there happen to be a vacancy" are equivalent.

When these three gentlemen were admitted to their seats the Senate had a considerable majority for one political party whose members had no conceivable advantage to gain by the admission, for a short time, of another person of the same political faith. The members of the two parties in the Senate were divided upon the question, and took different sides in the debate. There probably has never been an occasion, from the beginning of the Government, of a vote in the Senate in which it was more absolutely certain that the votes were wholly upon the constitutional merits of the question. In all these cases the vacancies occurred by the ending of the constitutional term. No legislature could lawfully elect a Senator under the statute of 1866 until June, although the Senatorial term began on the 4th of March. And it was held that the governor might appoint in those cases. We suppose that to be the accepted law, which would be enforced in a like case to-day. Now, if that be the accepted law, then the word "happen" does not mean "take place unexpectedly." It means "occur," and the rule of those cases is as applicable to the case where a legislature has met and failed to elect as where no legislature has met.

There can be plausible reasons given, we agree, for claiming that the word "happen" means "occur unexpectedly." But, as we conceive it, no plausible reason can be given for claiming that the words "if vacancies happen" mean "if vacancies begin." We find no authority anywhere for giving such a meaning to the term. It is true that, in the three cases of Montana, Washington, and Wyoming, which were argued and decided practically as one, and in the case of Mr. Corbett, of Oregon, there was a different result. In the Corbett case it was a disputed question whether the legislature had existed after the vacancy began or no. In the case of Lee Mantle, of Montana, the vacancy began during the vacation of the legislature. The legislature, which was entitled to elect a successor in anticipation of the vacancy, had adjourned before the ending of the previous term without an election.

The case of Allen, of Washington, was decided with the Lee Mantle case and without argument, a decision to which Mr. Beckwith, of Wyoming, submitted without further contest. At that time there was an earnest division in the Senate on an important question relating to the currency, which created for the time being more earnest differences of opinion than those existing between the two great political parties on other questions. It was a time not favorable to a dispassionate, nonpartisan judgment. We prefer the authority of the New Hampshire cases, which was acted on also in the case of Mr. Pasco, of Florida, and we think that a decision which must inevitably deprive States in the Union for long periods of time of their rightful representation under the Constitution will not be permitted long to stand, and that no settlement of the question in derogation of the rights of the States and, as we conceive, in violation of the intent of the framers of the Constitution should be acquiesced in.

We therefore recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Matthew S. Quay is entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania until the next meeting of the legislature."

GEO. F. HOAR.
WM. E. CHANDLER.
J. C. PRITCHARD.
L. E. McCOMAS.

"Mr. President, I have stated my opinion in debate and in printed reports on this question a good many times during the last twenty years. I do not wish to go over those arguments now. I wish merely to state very briefly and compactly, if I can, one or two propositions which may not in the first instance seem directly applicable to the main argument, and yet it will be found by anybody who reads the debates or reports or who talks with Senators in private that these propositions or their opposite seem to be constantly in the heads of Senators who are reflecting upon this question.

"In the beginning, I desire to ask the Senate to consider for a moment the condition of mind in the convention that framed the Constitution and the people who accepted it in regard to this question, with a view of ascertaining what they desired to do and would have done, if they could, by a proper expression.

"They were constructing a Government in a convention in which 11 States only were taking part. They were providing for a Senate to consist of only 22 men, in which they were to deposit half the legislative power of that Government, a share in the executive power, and a great judicial power affecting the interests and rights of the whole country. They expected that body, in the main, as everybody who is familiar with the history of that time well knows, to be a nonpartisan body. It was contrary to etiquette for many years after the Senate was organized to allude to party considerations in debate in this Chamber. The Senate was expected to be a sort of political supreme court, composed of men in whose judgment, by reason of their age, their character, their experience in public affairs, the whole country would have confidence, and, as I have said, they expected in the beginning that there would be but 22 of them. Rhode Island and North Carolina came in afterwards.

"I allude to this consideration to show how completely the idea that the whole country was interested in having the Senate full and how little the idea that it was a concern of a particular State alone whether there was a vacancy was in the mind of that convention and of the people.

"They proceeded to make a rule, a mechanism, by which this great assembly should be made up and should be kept full, and they did it by enacting that the State legislatures should appoint Senators, and they went on to say, 'vacancies may be filled by the executive.' That is the phrase they used.

"When they had said that, which, beyond all question was an enactment that whenever under any circumstances there was no Senator appointed by a legislature here, the chair should be filled by the governor, they had previously doubted whether the governor should not have the entire power. He represented the whole people of the State.

"He represented the dignity and the authority of the State in those days; he appointed every judicial officer and almost all of the high officers of the State—the sheriffs, district attorneys, judges. That was the arrangement they made, and that was passed by the Convention and reported in that form from the committee on detail. Then Mr. Ellsworth, than whom there was no greater constitutional lawyer and statesman on the face of the earth anywhere, made a brief remark reported by Mr. Madison. Mr. Randolph first said:

"'It is necessary in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate.'

"He was speaking of the provision that vacancies may be filled by the executive. Then Mr. Ellsworth says:

"'As there will be but two members from a State, vacancies may be of great moment.'

"Everything said on that subject, so far as reported, being to call the attention of the assembly to the importance of keeping the Senate without a vacancy. That being the condition of affairs, Mr. Madison, who was also the reporter of the debate as well as a participant in it, rose in his place and said, 'But there is a question in England whether a man holding a legislative office may resign or decline, and for that reason I suggest a change in the phraseology.' He then moved to strike out the words after 'vacancies' and insert the words, 'happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise, may be filled by the governor.'

"Mr. President, I hold it very unlikely that any body of men would make that great change which made it possible that there might be long vacancies continued—and vacancies are now continuing in this body week after week, month after month, and year after year—when nobody said anything about it, when the mover of the amendment did not disclose any such important purpose, and only mentioned a much less important and more insignificant purpose.

"The honorable Senator from Tennessee says that this language is not to be taken in any artificial, or constrained, or technical sense, but is to be taken in a popular sense. To that I agree; but I would prefer to say that it should be taken in the sense in which the Convention used it, and in which the people who voted, or the assemblies who represented the people in accepting it, took it when they accepted it.

"Let us see if we can not settle that. They used precisely the same words in regard to vacancies in two other cases; first, in regard to possible vacancies in the House of Representatives, and, second, in regard to possible vacancies in the executive offices where the President appoints, and precisely those same words, 'if vacancies happen,' have been from that day to this, held to include not only vacancies coming by chance, or in any particular way, but any possible vacancy arising under any circumstances at any time or under any conditions.

"So, in order to limit this language as it is attempted to limit it here, you have got to say, first, that a convention that meant to do exactly what is claimed here by those in favor of the seating of Mr. Quay, five minutes before, without any question, all of them having so voted and whose committee had so reported, adopted language having a totally different meaning without any suggestion of a change of mind in this very important particular; and, next, that having adopted this language to express in this particular clause a totally different meaning, they used the same language in two other clauses in the same Constitution to express the purpose they at first entertained.

'Mr. President, I stated just now that I thought there was one consideration which, in the first instance did not seem to be so very important, but which seemed to be in the minds of Senators who debated this question on the floor, or who discussed this question in their private consultations, or who may do so, and that is, that if a State legislature meet and fail to make an election of a Senator, the State has neglected to perform a duty; that the State is in fault. You find that phrase all through the speeches on the other side of this question, that the governor can not appoint if the State legislature has neglected its duty. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, in his very interesting and able address the other day, said that if the State legislature neglected to elect, did not elect a Senator, its members had violated their oaths. Let us see if this proposition will bear the light. I maintain the contrary. I submit to the considerate judgment of Senators that not only it is no negligence, that it is no violation of an oath, but under many circumstances which are conceivable—and not only conceivable, but many conditions which frequently exist—the members of a State legislature would violate their oaths and depart from their duty if they made an election.

"In the beginning it was expected that two houses, two separate political persons, two corporate bodies, must separately choose the same man, and now there must be a majority of all the members of the joint body to choose a Senator voting for the same man. There are many cases familiar to all of us where these two bodies can not agree, or where there are three parties in the joint convention who can not agree, when the difference between them goes down not merely to the deepest interest of the Republic, but to the very root of the moral law itself. Take the case of one of our recent conditions; take the case in a Southern State of two legislatures, one believing and its members believing with all their might and main that the late election law was tyrannic, was unrepublican, was a violation not only of the Constitution, but of every sound principle of legislation and of the principles of public liberty, and the other body believing with equal sincerity that the failure by national authority to secure the purity of elections in regard to Representatives in the other House was a great public crime. Could they conscientiously agree on a Senator?

"Suppose Aaron Burr were the candidate of one party and Thomas Jefferson of the other, or suppose Aaron Burr and Thomas Jefferson and some Federalist had been the three candidates, and a joint convention was to choose upon joint ballot. Is it neglect, is it a breach of the oath, is it a violation of constitutional duty, when any one of those representing those three opinions finds it impossible for him to agree with the men representing either of the others?

"Why, Mr. President, the framers of the Constitution meant to provide for just that case in other respects, did they not? Twice in our history has there been a failure of the electoral majority, of the persons chosen to the electoral colleges to agree, and will my honorable friend from Tennessee, or any other honorable friend, claim that the men who voted for Aaron Burr during those long ballotings, or the men who voted for Thomas Jefferson, or in a later year, the men who voted for John Quincy Adams and for Andrew Jackson, or for Henry Clay, or for William H. Crawford, were violating their oaths and that, to be consistent in our logic, the American people ought to be punished by not having a President for four years? Do the electors violate their oaths when they fail to choose a President? Does the House violate an oath when it fails to make a choice? The framers of the Constitution provided for the very case of a failure in bodies, which must act by majorities only, to get majorities for any particular candidate, and in case of President they went further and provided also in the case of a failure of the House of Representatives to elect. Two successive cases of failure to elect a President were provided for in the Constitution.

"Can anybody believe, who reflects on it impartially, that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to make a similar provision that should cover every case and should cover the whole time in regard to the great office of Senator? Why, Mr. President, they knew as well as you know how important a single vote may be. A single vote within the last twelve or thirteen months would have changed the whole policy of our Government with reference to imperialism. A single vote saved Andrew Johnson from impeachment. A single vote passed the bill taking newspapers out of the mail, a vote which tended so much to bring on the political destruction of Martin Van Buren and the overthrow of a dynasty. Twice in my own Commonwealth a single vote has elected the chief magistrate. Now, is it to be supposed they would have for a moment contemplated the idea that the great State of Pennsylvania, which now has a people of more than double the entire population who accepted this Constitution, should be shorn of half its strength, and that the people of the United States should be without the presence here of a gentleman to utter the voice and represent the will of 3,5000,000 people?

"Mr. President, the question before us is just that question. Did the men who framed this Constitution intend, would they have thought for a moment, that these great political corporations for great spaces of time on great questions should be without their lawful representation and their lawful voice here?

"It may be said that the executive, after all, if the legislature fails to agree, may appoint somebody whom the people as represented by a majority of the legislature would not approve. But that is our universal policy. If you can not get a majority you do not leave the people interested unrepresented; you take a plurality, do you not? And in every instance now throughout the entire country, I believe, a plurality of voices elects the Representatives in the other House, and nowhere is a majority required.

"Mr. President, when you couple with these considerations the fact that the language the framers of the Constitution used means in the same instrument in two other places that there shall be no vacancy and the office shall be kept full, that they did not utter, they did not make any suggestion of changing their mind in this particular, that they had unanimously adopted language which said "vacancies shall be filled"—when you couple with that the constitutional declaration of the importance of this matter, as shown in the enactment that no State shall be deprived of its equal voice in the Senate without its own consent, the justice of my contention will be manifest.

"The American people may, by constitutional processes and in a lawful way, make any changes in their Constitution whatever but one. They may establish a limited monarchy; they may do away with every safeguard of life, liberty, and property; they may amalgamate this country with races or States; but one thing they can not do, unless 45 States shall agree, and that is, leave a State with but half a voice in the Senate.

"These things, Mr. President, seem to me to be the large considerations that belong to this topic. They are such considerations as, it seems to me, would be in the minds of the statesmen in that convention and of that generation. If you had come in in the light of these things and somebody had got up and said, 'There will be a State by and by whose legislature meets but once in four years; there will be a great many States by and by whose legislatures meet but once in two years; now, if it happens that a week or ten days or a fortnight before one of those legislatures adjourns a Senator dies, or if it happens that one of those legislatures tries to elect a Senator and can not do it because there are three opinions, each conscientiously held,' do you mean, gentlemen, that for two years, or for four years, or for one year, or for half a year, that that State shall be unrepresented?

"It may happen in regard to two Senators from the same State. Frequently in our history there has been such a condition of things that two Senators were to be voted for at once, or were to be appointed at once. It happened once in my own State, and it happened in the case of Mississippi not long ago. Do you mean in such a case the governor can not appoint? 'Why, no,' the answer would have been, 'We no more mean that that thing should happen, and that the whole country should be without the voice of that Senator, than we mean that the executive offices should be vacant under like circumstances, or that seats in the House of Representatives should be vacant under like circumstances; and you will observe that we have said in regard to the Senate just what we have said in regard to them.'

* * * * * * *

"Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one judicial construction which I think has not been lately cited in the debate, and that is in the State of Pennsylvania. The constitution of Pennsylvania provides that the governor may fill any vacancy 'which may happen' in any judicial or elective office. It was held in Walsh v. Commonwealth (89 Pa. St. Rep., 419), just as it has been held in our dealing with executive officers, that where the legislature created a new county the governor was authorized to appoint all the officers of that new county without their being elective officers ordinarily until an election could be held, on the ground that there was a vacancy happening within the meaning of the constitution of the State.

"Mr. President, my friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Turley] says—and it struck me that the argument he made was more against than in favor of his proposition—that if the framers of the Constitution meant what it is claimed they meant how easy it would have been to have said 'appoint a Senator till the legislature fill the office.' The fact that they did not say so, where they could have said it so easily, seems to him a strong argument that they did not mean it. But what they did say has been construed to mean exactly that thing. They said 'appoint until the next session of the legislature,' and the Senate says, as they also said so emphatically, that the Senate should be always full; that it means till the next adjournment of the legislature, which they did not say.

"I should like to ask this question, which I have never heard answered: What difference in principle is there between the case of a vacancy that begins at one time and the case of a vacancy that begins at another; between the case of a vacancy happening according to your construction of the word 'happen' and the case of a vacancy happening according to my construction of the word 'happen?' Is there any reason that can be conceived of on earth or in heaven which would induce any intelligent body framing a constitution to say that if the legislature has not met the governor may appoint, and if it has met the governor shall not appoint, unless what I have just spoken of now can be accounted a crime, perjury, negligence on the part of the legislature who can not agree?

"Now, one of these things which our ancestors feared was a failure on the part of the State to take interest enough in this General Government to keep the seats in the Senate and in the House full. You will find that fear constantly in the early discussions on the Constitution, even down to Mr. Webster's time. Mr. Webster, as late as 1825 or 1830, spoke of the danger that the States might not perform their constitutional duty of keeping the Senate full, and he said, in a passage cited in both the majority and minority reports on this question, that such a negligence would be fatal or destructive to any other country but ours. And then he adds, the Constitution, to secure us against this evil, lays hold of the individual conscience. But the individual conscience of the legislature is not sufficient for that purpose, and you are not safe any the more for the individual conscience of the legislature if they can not agree in regard to the character or the principles or the policy of the man upon whom they must unite. No oath can make a jury agree. No oath of office can create a majority among men conscientiously differing in opinion. But behind the legislature and behind the individual consciences of senators or representatives of the State, whose individual consciences may not let them agree, you have one place where the individual conscience is to be laid hold of, where it is sure to create individual action, and that is the conscience and the action of the executive.

"He has to agree with nobody; he has to reconcile no difference of opinion, and he has the power and the right and the sworn duty to fill the office if the legislature can not fill it; and in that way, and in that way alone, is the security of the whole Republic assured."

"Mr. President:

* * * * * * *

"A recital of the facts in this case, in connection with the foregoing provisions of the Constitution, will disclose the exact question involved. In 1893 the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania elected Matthew S. Quay a Senator for the full term of six years from the 4th of March, 1893. He accepted and held such office until the expiration of the term, March 3, 1899. The legislature failed to elect his successor, and as a consequence such office became vacant on the 4th of March, 1899. The legislature was in session, however, at the time such vacancy occurred, and had been since the 2d of January previous, and continued in session until the 20th of April, 1899, when it adjourned sine die without electing a successor to Senator Quay for the succeeding term of six years. Thereafter, and on the 21st of April, 1899, the governor of the State appointed and commissioned Matthew S. Quay to hold the office of Senator 'until the next meeting of the legislature,' invoking as his authority for such action the provision of the Constitution already quoted, namely:

"'If vacancies happen during the recess of the legislature, by resignation, or otherwise, the executive of the State may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

* * * * * * *

"Proceeding, then, to the consideration of the exact issue involved, let me again direct the attention of the Senate to the wording of the constitutional provision in controversy:

"'If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature, the executive of the State may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

"The language employed is so clear, simple, and direct, the wonder to my mind is that there should ever have been any contention as to its import. If the rule laid down by Judge Story applicable to the construction of constitutions be applied to this provision, what room can there be for doubt or question as to its true meaning? Judge Story says:

"'Every word employed in the Constitution is to be expounded in its plain, obvious, and common-sense meaning, unless the context furnishes some ground to control, qualify, or enlarge it. Constitutions are not designed for metaphysical or logical subtleties, for niceties of expression, for critical propriety, for elaborate shades of meaning, or for the exercise of philosophical acuteness or judicial research. They are instruments of a practical nature, founded on the common business of human life, adapted to common wants, designed for common use, and fitted for common understandings. The people make them; the people adopt them; the people must be supposed to read them, with the help of common sense, and can not be presumed to admit in them any recondite meaning or any extraordinary gloss.' (1 Story, p. 322.)

"In the light of this rule of construction I confess it is difficult for me to comprehend how any serious difference of opinion could possibly have arisen as to the significance of the words employed; and yet it is a fact that a sharp contention is now made as to the true intent and meaning of the provision in question.

"These antagonistic opinions are set forth at length in the report of the committee and the views of the minority submitted in this case, from which the exact points of difference are made to appear. They may be summarized as follows:

"On the one hand, it is contended (and this is the view of the majority of the committee) that the vacancy to which the governor can make temporary appointment must be a vacancy, in the language of the Constitution, that 'happens during the recess of the legislature,' meaning thereby that it must be a vacancy having its beginning, its inception, during the time and when the legislature is not in session; and that a vacancy occurring when the legislature is in session, as was the fact in this case, is not such a vacancy as the governor of the State can supply by temporary appointment; and, further, that the vacancy which the governor can supply must not only 'happen during the recess of the legislature,' but it must occur, in the language of the Constitution, by 'resignation or otherwise'—meaning by 'otherwise' some like unforeseen event against which human foresight can not provide.

"On the other hand, it is insisted (and this is the contention of the minority) that the expression 'happen during the recess' does not mean that the vacancy must actually 'happen,' or come into existence, have its inception 'during the recess,' but the true intent and meaning is that if a vacancy 'happen' to exist in recess, though it had its inception and beginning when the legislature was in session, yet, upon the adjournment of the legislature, such a vacancy becomes a vacancy 'happening during the recess,' within the meaning of the Constitution, which the executive of the State can supply by temporary appointment; and that the expression by 'resignation or otherwise' embraces all conceivable vacancies from whatever cause, and that therefore it follows whenever the executive finds a vacancy existing for any cause, and the legislature is not in session at the time, he may make temporary appointment to such vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature. I think I have stated accurately the exact issue.

"It will be observed that the exercise of this power of temporary appointment by the State executive is not mandatory, as in the case of vacancies in the House, but he 'may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.' It lies wholly within his discretion. He may convene the legislature, or make temporary appointment until the legislature shall meet in regular or extraordinary session. The reason for leaving the exercise of this power within the discretion of the executive was given by Mr. Ellsworth in the debate in the Constitutional Convention in explanation of this provision, when he said:

"'It is only said the executive may supply vacancies. When the legislative meeting happens to be near the power will not be exerted.'

"For this reason the exercise of the appointive power was purposely made discretionary.

"And thus by these various provisions the necessary machinery was provided, not only for the primary selection of the membership of both Houses, but the supplying of vacancies which might happen in such membership—a machinery so perfect and complete that it need only to be employed by those in whose hands it is intrusted to insure, at all times, a full membership of both Houses of Congress.

"In the examination of these various provisions it will be observed that the legislature of the State is, under the Constitution, the sole depository of the power to elect United States Senators either for a full term or to fill a vacancy. The executive of a State can not choose Senators nor fill vacancies—this power is lodged exclusively with the State legislature. The executive 'may make temporary appointments' under certain circumstances and conditions, but in no case is he authorized to fill either the original term or any vacancy which may happen therein. That power is lodged exclusively with the legislature. This will be conceded.

"When, therefore, Senator Quay's term expired on the 4th of March, 1899, it was the right and the duty of the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, then in session, to choose his successor for the full term of six years. This was the express mandate of the Constitution, and, as Webster said in the constitutional convention of Massachusetts in 1820.

"'Whatsoever is enjoined on the legislature of the State by the Constitution of the United States the legislature is bound to perform.'

"Not only this, but by the act of Congress passed in 1866 it is provided that—

"'The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the term for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.'

"The legislature of Pennsylvania, therefore, in session on the 4th of March, 1899, at the time the vacancy occurred in this case, was, in the language of the act of 1866, the legislature 'chosen next preceding the expiration of the term for which' Senator Quay was elected. This particular legislature, therefore, in session on the 4th of March, 1899, and remaining in continuous session until the 20th of April, 1899, was resting under the double mandate of the Constitution and the law to elect a Senator for the full term of six years, and, as I said before, no other power was authorized to perform this duty. It failed to discharge that constitutional and legal obligation, and on the 20th day of April, 1899, adjourned without day, leaving the office of United States Senator vacant. It is the vacancy thus created which the governor of the State of Pennsylvania attempts to supply by a temporary appointment, invoking as his authority the constitutional provision already cited.

"This is the storm center around which the entire controversy rages. To this point, therefore, I direct the attention of the Senate.

"That the executive of a State has the power, under certain circumstances and conditions, to make temporary appointments of United States Senators is not denied, but the extent of such power is the only matter in controversy. The executive is empowered to make temporary appointments under certain restrictions and limitations, clearly set forth and defined. He has no authority, however, to supply all vacancies unless the construction contended for by the minority shall prevail. That power was expressly withheld by the Convention that framed the Constitution.

"It may be well at this point to glance at the proceedings of the Convention to determine, if possible, the true intent and meaning of this provision, and what the framers of the Constitution designed to do and did do in relation to supplying vacancies. Nothing further was necessary to perfect the machinery for the election of Senators—it only remained to provide for the contingency of vacancies.

"It will be well, therefore, to trace—and I will do it briefly—the plan for creating the Senate and for supplying vacancies therein. There were twenty-four resolutions agreed to in the Convention expressive of the general plan of government. Three of these resolutions—the fourth, the eleventh, and the twenty-second—relate to the organization of the Senate. These general resolutions were referred to the committee on detail.

"When the committee on detail made its report to the Convention, the Convention modified the report in many particulars, and after such modification of the report of the committee on detail it was referred to the committee on style. After the committee on style reported, the Convention itself modified the report of that committee, and as thus modified it was embodied in the Constitution.

"And at this point, for the convenience of the argument, I present in order the steps taken in perfecting the provision in relation to the Senate and vacancies therein:

"First. The resolutions of the convention, as agreed to and referred to committee on detail.

"Second. Report of committee on detail.

"Third. Modification by the convention of the report of the committee on detail and as referred to committee on style.

"Fourth. Report of committee on style.

"Fifth. Modification of report of committee on style as finally embodied in Constitution.

"'4. Resolved, That the members of the second branch of the Legislature of the United States ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of thirty years at least, to hold their offices for six years, one-third to go out biennially. * * *' (1) Resolutions agreed to by convention and referred to committee on detail.

"'11. Resolved, That in the second branch of the Legislature of the United States each State shall have an equal vote.'

"'22. Resolved, That the representation in the second branch of the Legislature of the United States shall consist of two members from each State, who shall vote per capita.'

"Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. (2) Report of the committee on detail.

Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature. (3) Modifications by convention of report of the committee on detail, and as thus modified referred to committee on style.

"And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature. (4) Report of the committee on style.

"And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies. (5) Report of committee on style as modified by convention and inserted in the Constitution.

"It would be well, therefore, as I say, to trace the plan for creating the Senate and supplying vacancies therein, from its inception to its completed form, as it was finally agreed to and embodied in the Constitution as it stands to-day.

"The subject came up in convention in committee of the whole, and all the various plans and suggestions were considered as to the manner of electing Senators, their term of service, qualifications, etc. The committee of the whole finally reported to the convention, as the result of its deliberations, a series of resolutions, the following of which related to the constitution of the Senate:

"'Resolved, That the members of the second branch of the national legislature ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of 30 years, at least, to hold their office for a term sufficient to insure their independence, namely, seven years.'

"When this resolution came up in the convention for consideration a great contention arose, among other things, over the basis of representation, the smaller States refusing to agree to any plan which did not give them equal voice in the Senate. This brought the convention, as Sherman said, to a 'full stop,' requiring the efforts of a subcommittee of one from each State to adjust differences and harmonize conflicting views, and the final upshot of the matter was that the convention agreed to twenty-three propositions as embodying its views on the fundamental principles of the government to be established, three of which related to the Senate, as follows:

"'Fourth. That the members of the second branch of the legislature of the United States ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of 30 years, at least, to hold their offices for six years, one-third to go out biennially.

"'Eleventh. That in the second branch of the legislature of the United States each State shall have an equal vote.

"'Twenty-second. That the representation in the second branch of the legislature of the United States shall consist of two members from each State who shall vote per capita.'

"These twenty-three resolves of the convention above mentioned were then referred to the 'committee of detail' to work out and formulate and express in proper phrase the ideas embodied therein. It will be remembered that there was also referred to this committee, in connection with these resolutions, Mr. Pinckney's draft of a federal government, presumably for such helpful suggestion as it might contain and in which for the first time, so far as I have been able to discover, the idea of supplying vacancies appears.

"The Congress, by Pinckney's plan, was to consist of a house of delegates and a senate, and it was provided by this plan that—

"'vacancies in the house of delegates were to be supplied by the executive authority of the State in which they shall happen.'

"The senate was to be chosen by the house of delegates and—

"'The house of delegates shall fill all vacancies that arise from death or resignation for the time of service remaining of the member so dying or resigning.'

"By referring the Pinckney plan, which contained a method for supplying vacancies, to the committee of detail, this question was also before the committee, although up to that time the convention had expressed no opinion upon that subject.

"There went to the committee of detail, therefore, three settled principles in the organization of the Senate which the convention had determined:

"First. That the Senators should be chosen by the legislatures.

"Second. That there should be equal representation, and to that end there should be two Senators from each State, voting per capita.

"Third. A suggestion in the Pinckney plan as to the method of filling vacancies.

"The committee of detail, to which was referred the three resolves above mentioned and the Pinckney plan, reported back the following provision:

"'The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.'

* * * * * * *

"When the report of the committee of detail came up for consideration in the convention, objection was at once made to the supplying of vacancies by the executive as conferring upon that officer a too liberal grant of power, as shown by the following debate:

"'Mr. Wilson objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the legislature will meet so frequently.

"'Mr. Randolph thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate.

"'Mr. WILLIAMSON. Senators may resign or not accept. This provision, therefore, is absolutely necessary.'

"Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignation could be made by Senators or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after 'vacancies' and insert the words—

"'happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"Now note what they did. Instead of 'vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature,' the convention changed that and said 'vacancies may be supplied by the legislature or by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"So that that clause of the Constitution read:

"'Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"What does that mean but that if the legislature is present it shall fill the vacancy, and the governor can not act in such a case?

"Gouverneur Morris, in support of Madison, said:

"'This is absolutely necessary; otherwise, as members chosen into the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it will be in the power of a legislature, by appointing a man against his consent, to deprive the United States of his services.'

"In lieu, therefore, of the provision, as reported by the committee of detail, that 'vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature,' the report was modified by the convention to conform to the suggestions made, so that it read: 'Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.' Instead, therefore, of unbridled power being conferred upon the executive to fill vacancies arising from whatever cause, his power was thus still further curbed and restricted.

"A vacancy happening by the expiration of a term, as in this case, confessedly is not a vacancy caused by 'refusal to accept' or 'by resignation,' but solely by the failure of the legislature to act, and therefore not within the competency of the executive to supply, unless such a vacancy is embraced within the meaning of the word 'otherwise.' Of this I will have something to say later on. I will observe in passing, however, that independent of the known rule of construction, that a word of general import is controlled and limited by the specific word with which it is associated, it is a little remarkable that at no time and nowhere in the proceedings of the convention was there the remotest suggestion by any member of that convention that the legislature might fail to do its duty, and that it was intended to confer upon the executive the power of appointment in such a contingency.

"Neither Madison nor anyone else ever suggested filling such a vacancy. They suggested death, removal, expulsion, resignation, but never the failure of the legislature to do its duty. If that had been the purpose, how easy it would have been to have said 'if vacancies happen by failure of the legislature to elect, by resignation, or otherwise.' They surely would not have left so vast and far-reaching power to be inferred from the word 'otherwise' as used in that connection.

"It would seem much more reasonable to suppose that, when Madison suggested a doubt as to whether Senators could resign or refuse to accept, these words were inserted for the purpose of removing that doubt, and then instead of inserting, as in the Pinckney plan, the word 'death,' etc., and enumerating all the other casualties which might happen to an incumbent of the office, they were all embraced in the word 'otherwise.' And it will be observed that every suggestion of vacancy by the convention, by speech or amendment, had reference to something happening to the incumbent of the office and not to dereliction of duty on the part of the legislature. It is hardly to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution intended to embrace within the meaning of that word a failure of the legislature to perform its duty, for that would have been to admit in the beginning a fatal defect in their plan of government.

"More than this, as Senator Vance well said in the Mantle case:

"'Can the Senator point out any case in the Constitution where, a duty being primarily imposed upon an officer therein named, the performance of that duty is conferred upon another officer contingent upon the failure of the first officer to perform his duty?'

"And Senator Garland, the ex-Attorney-General of the United States, said in the debate in 1879:

"'It is a well-established principle of jurisprudence that when one tribunal has jurisdiction and fails to exercise it, no other tribunal can assume it.'

"It will be observed that the convention still further modified the report of the committee of detail, which, it will be remembered, provided that—

"'vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"by adding—

"'or by the legislature of the State.'

"et cetera, so that the provision as a whole was made to read as follows:

"'Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignation, or otherwise may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"By this it will be seen that the convention, instead of conferring the power of supplying vacancies exclusively upon the executive, vested it primarily in the legislature, so jealous were they of executive control over the matter of choosing Senators. The authority of the executive was secondary. They were evidently determined that the executive should not be permitted to take the selection of Senators either for a full term or to fill a vacancy away from the legislature, where the primary power had been deposited. The manifest purpose in this modification was to make it incumbent upon the legislature, in the first instance, to fill the vacancy, but if the legislature was not in session or for any cause could not act, then the vacancy was to be supplied 'by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature'—until the legislature, the primary power, could act. In this form, as thus modified by the convention, it was referred to the committee on style, which reported it back to the convention in the following form:

"And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, 'during the recess of the legislature of any State'"—

"This is the first time that clause appears—

"'during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"It is conceded that the committee on style was only authorized to put in proper form and phrase that to which the convention had already agreed. Now note what the committee did. First, they dropped the words 'refusals to accept' as evidently being surplusage, being included within the meaning of the word 'otherwise.' They had evidently abandoned the suggestion of Madison, that it was necessary to include these words in order to confer upon a Senator the right of 'refusal to accept.' Secondly, they dropped the words—

"'by the legislature of the States in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen'--

"evidently for the reason that the legislature, if in session or if convened, had the power to fill vacancies under its original grant of power to elect Senators, and this provision was, therefore, unnecessary, and inserted in lieu thereof the words—

"'during the recess of the legislature of any State'—

"thus still further limiting the power of the governor over vacancies to those which should happen when the legislature was not in session—when the primary power was absent and could not act; so that the provision as formulated by the committee on style read:

"'And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.'

"It is worthy of note, too, in this connection that the committee on style dropped the words 'may be supplied' and inserted, for the first time, the words 'may make temporary appointment.' Why was this done? 'Supply' is defined to mean 'to fill up,' but it is clear the convention never intended to allow the governor to fill the vacancy; and so these words were stricken out and 'may make temporary appointment' inserted, 'temporary' meaning, as defined by lexicographers, 'lasting for a time only; existing or continuing for a limited time; not permanent.' From this it will be seen how guarded the convention was in conferring this power of appointment upon the executive of the State, and how determined they were to restrict it within the narrowest possible limits. Not content with this, when the convention took up the report of the committee on style, to compare it with the articles agreed to and referred to that committee, they modified the provision as reported from the committee on style by adding after 'legislature' the words 'which shall then fill such vacancies,' as if to set definite bounds to the exercise of this limited power, beyond which the executive could not go, and, as thus modified, it was embodied in the final draft of the Constitution.

"Now, it has been said that the clause, 'which shall then fill such vacancies,' refers to those vacancies to which the governor might make temporary appointments; and if the governor can not make a temporary appointment in this case, then the legislature can not fill. The expression 'shall fill such vacancy' does not refer to such vacancies as the governor may supply, but to the original vacancy. Our friends on the other side insist upon reading into the Constitution power to supply vacancies, which the executive does not possess, and then draw the conclusion if the governor has not the power to supply then the legislature can not fill.

"This is a correct history, step by step, of the development of this provision from its inception to its final completion and embodiment in the Constitution, where it stands to-day in clear and unmistakable phrase:

"'If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.'

* * * * * * *

"The whole contention of the minority resolves itself into this—the executive may fill any vacancy he finds existing when the legislature is in recess. A vacancy and the absence of the legislature are the only prerequisites for executive action. The framers of the Constitution when they said, 'If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy,' intended only to say the executive of the State may fill all vacancies when the legislature is not in session.

"If at the expiration of a term, though the legislature may be in session at that time, and remain in session many weeks thereafter, yet if it finally adjourn without making a choice of Senator, immediately upon such adjournment the governor may appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, which is construed to mean not only to the meeting of the legislature, but to its final adjournment if no choice is made. If at the next meeting of the legislature thereafter there should again be no choice, immediately upon its adjournment the governor may again appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, and so continue the process indefinitely until some legislature shall make a choice of a Senator, so that seats in this Chamber are to be filled by governors so long and as often as the legislature shall refuse or fail to elect.

"In this very case, as an illustration, in the approaching election in Pennsylvania, only about six months distant, if ex-Senator Quay should be a candidate for reelection it will not be necessary for him to carry a majority of the legislature, but only to secure a sufficient number of adherents to prevent an election and force an adjournment, when Governor Stone can again disregard the mandates of his own constitution, refuse to call a session of the legislature, and again issue his commission to Senator Quay to hold a seat in this body until the next meeting of the legislature, and then, upon the theory of the minority, he would be seated, and thus repeat the process for the full term of six years, and thus continue to hold a seat in this body by the favoritism of the governor, and independent of the will of the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania. Is the Senate of the United States prepared to indorse a construction which would lead to such results?

* * * * * * *

"And in this connection I can not refrain from again quoting the words of Hamilton in the Federalist (p. 393), where he says in explanation of this provision of the Constitution:

"'It may be alleged that, by declining the appointment of Senators, they'

"Meaning the legislatures—

"'might at any time give a fatal blow to the Union. It is certainly true that the State legislatures, by forbearing the appointment of Senators, may destroy the National Government. So far as that construction may expose the Union to the possibility of injury from the State legislatures, it is an evil, but it is an evil which could not have been avoided without excluding the States in their political capacities wholly from a place in the organization of the National Government.'

"But how could the State legislatures, if the contention of the minority be sound, by forbearing the appointment of Senators, destroy the National Government? The executive can appoint whenever and as often as the legislature fails to elect. How it would have quieted the apprehension of Alexander Hamilton for the safety of the National Government if he could have but known that the governors of the States had the power to keep the Senate always full, though the legislatures should fail to do so. He was evidently laboring under the delusion that if the legislatures failed to elect there was no remedy, and the whole fabric of government would be placed in jeopardy. How natural it would have been for Hamilton, in his defense of this provision of the Constitution, if such a defense were permissible, in answer to the criticism that the States, by withholding Senators, might break up the National Government, to have said in reply what is contended for now by the minority, that if the legislature fails to elect at any time the Constitution empowers the executive of the State to appoint Senators, and so keep the Senate always full. It seems inexplicable that Hamilton, a member of the convention that framed the Constitution, should have lost sight of this power of the governor to supplement the failure of the legislature.

"And so we have this plain provision of the Constitution distorted and made to read, 'whenever vacancies exist for any cause, and the legislature is not in session, the executive may make temporary appointment until some legislature fills the vacancy.' When I consider how this provision is warped and twisted, that it may temporarily serve personal or party ends, I am again reminded of the words of Senator Hill:

"'When I hear gentlemen on either side of this Chamber, in either party of this country, take that plain language of the Constitution and construe it to apply to any vacancies that may occur by any means, by the failure of the legislature, willfully or otherwise, to elect a Senator, that the governor can come in and supply the vacancy, I must say it excites my profound astonishment, more than that, my sorrow. It absolutely shakes my confidence in the efficacy of written constitutions.

"'The primary object of the Constitution is to put in the State legislature the power to fill this office, and nobody else; but casualties may occur, death may come, resignation may come, Senators may be expelled, there may be divers casualties by which the term thus filled by the legislature may become vacant, and vacant during the recess of the legislature when Congress may be in session. It is important, therefore, as was said by Mr. Randolph, to allow the governor power to fill chasms, but not to fill an original term.'

"What did the great Seward, of New York, say?

"'This alarm'—

"Speaking of the effect of the contention of the minority—

"'This alarm will be increased by the fact that the proceeding will operate to strengthen and increase the provisional prerogative of the governors of the States at the expense of the power conferred by the Constitution on the legislatures of the States; for nothing is clearer than that the power conferred on the governors to fill vacancies was designed to be but occasional and exceptional, and subordinate to that devolved on the legislature, which was designed to be general, complete, and supreme.'

"William H. Seward, it will be admitted, was a great constitutional lawyer.

"I commend to the Senators from Illinois the language of Justice Davis, who, when in the Senate, commenting upon this very provision, said:

"'The whole question is in a narrow compass, and the view of the Constitution which has been presented by different gentlemen who have discussed the subject, especially by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Hill], and last by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Carpenter], in my judgment presents the proper construction of that instrument.

"'I do not believe'—

"Says Judge Davis—

"'that the vacancy mentioned in that clause of the Constitution is anything else than a portion of the six years' term where there is no person qualified to discharge the functions of the office. The principle asserted in the Lanman decision is that the legislature of a State shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the governor's power under the Constitution; that where opportunity is given to the legislature to choose a Senator the governor can not appoint. A vacancy within the meaning of the constitutional provision does not arise by the failure of a legislature to elect.

"'I think that the decision in Lanman's case, as I understand it, gives the true interpretation of the Constitution, that when the legislature had the opportunity of providing a Senator but failed, the governor can not appoint.'

"Attorney-General Garland, a great lawyer, said, in the debate on the Bell case in 1879:

"'Mr. President, the position that I take in reference to this matter from my reading of the Constitution is that legislatures of the States, being the original constituency of the United States, must themselves by election place a Senator in this body at the beginning of a new term; or, to state the proposition somewhat differently, it is not within the meaning of the Constitution that the governor of a State can put upon the floor of the Senate a Senator at the commencement of a new term of six years, or a new term that might be by the meeting of the legislature afterwards for a shorter period. Before the governor of a State can appoint a Senator to fill what he may consider a vacancy in the Senate, there must not only be an unfilled seat but a broken term previously held by someone else.

* * * * * * *

"'According to the interpretation of the Senator from Delaware, if the legislature of any State of the eleven that first ratified the Constitution had failed to send two Senators here to compose the Senate, the governor of the State could have sent two to compose the body. There is no halfway ground, because we have heard it enunciated here by the Senator from Delaware and by the minority report that if the vacancy exists, by a robust and athletic construction of the Constitution, somebody must fill it—it must not go unfilled.

* * * * * * *

"'Now, we have the vacation of these seats by law. When that is done, according to the fair interpretation of this instrument, the legislature alone can step in. Then:

"'"And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise."

"'That is, "if vacancies happen" after the seats have been filled, after the legislature has chosen, "by resignation or otherwise," meaning by expulsion or by death. The word "happen," whether you enlarge it or whether you narrow it in its construction, affects at last the incumbent in the seat by some accident or by some casualty. Hence the word "happen" is used, referring to something which takes him out of the seat, leaving both an unfilled seat and a broken term.'

* * * * * * *

"Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, said:

"'When the legislature last in session previous to the expiration of a Senatorial term, having power to make an election, refuses or neglects to do so, then until an election can be made, in conformity with the Constitution of the Union, the State, by its legislature, has consented to waive its right to equal representation in this Chamber.'

"Did Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, know anything about the Constitution? He said:

"'Where a Senatorial term has expired by its own limitation under the Constitution, and an absence of representation results from that cause, it is not a vacancy within the meaning of the Constitution. Vacancies happening in the representation of the Senate during a recess of the legislature may be filled by the governor of a State.

"'But I presume no man ever contended—certainly not since the Lanman case—that a governor, under the power to fill vacancies, could make an appointment to an original term of office.

"'Therefore, when we speak of vacancies happening in the constitutional sense, we must be understood as meaning cases where the term has once been filled and subsequently becomes vacant by registration or otherwise.

* * * * * * *

"'Why, sir, the Constitution provides that in the election of Senators generally it shall be done by the legislature of each State; it provides by implication that in case of vacancies which occur during the session of the legislature the legislature shall elect; but it also provides that if the vacancy occurs during the recess of the legislature the legislature shall not elect in the first instance, but that the governor shall appoint, and that the appointment shall continue until the next meeting of the legislature, and that the legislature shall then elect.'

"Senator Cass, of my own State, a great lawyer and a man of recognized ability, said:

"'How, then, stands this case, sir? The third clause of the first article of the Constitution provides for the composition of the Senate by fixing the term of service and the mode of selecting the Senators, permanent and temporary. It declares that "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." The regular terms of Senators are for six years, and the "vacancies" herein provided for are the unexpired portions of such terms, which are to be "filled" by the legislature when it can act, and when it can not act to be occupied by temporary executive appointments. If, therefore, a Senator resign, or his seat is otherwise vacated, except by the expiration of his term, the "vacancy" is for his original period of service, to be temporarily appointed to by the governor or "filled" by the legislature.'

* * * * * * *

"Senator James A. Bayard held to the same doctrine:

"'You find that in reference to the full term of a Senator the provision is that he shall hold his office for six years and be chosen by the legislature. The executive has no authority there. And you find, further, that if the legislature is not in session at the time a vacancy occurs by resignation or otherwise, though it may not even be known to them, yet no authority in such a case is confided to the executive to appoint.

"'You find, in other words, that within the intent of the Constitution no authority over the subject is meant to be intrusted to the executive whenever the primary power—the legislature—is in existence as an organized body. I am aware that at one time it was decided that even in reference to the full term the executive of a State might make an appointment until the legislature met; but that construction was subsequently overruled by the Senate in the case of Mr. Lanman in the year 1825, and ever since the practice has been uniformly in accordance with the decision in that case.

"'In reference to the full term, it can not be doubted that no authority whatever is confided to the executive. The negation of power in any other event than when the vacancy occurs in recess shows that it was the intent of the Constitution that the executive was merely to provide for casualties happening when the legislative power, which is the primary power, was not in existence, and, of course, could not act.'

"Senator Mason, of Virginia, said:

"'The Constitution has created Senatorial terms and has declared that those terms shall last for six years; they are so arranged by another provision of the Constitution that one-third of the Senate go out biennially. What is the language of the Constitution as affecting the duration of the term? The Constitution declares that the seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the end of two years, of the second class at the end of four, and of the third at the end of six years, thus creating the terms. The language of the Constitution is that the seat "shall be vacated" by the lapse of time, and then new terms commence.

"'A few words now as to the precedents. Until Lanman's case, according to my recollection, it was considered by the Senate, or rather it was decided by the Senate, manifestly without consideration, that it was competent for the State executive when a term expired in the recess of the legislature to treat that as a vacancy and to fill it accordingly. Such a practice was common until the decision in Lanman's case. I confess that on looking at the Constitution my first impression was that the practice was correct, but on examining the Constitution and weighing it carefully and deliberately I can not entertain a doubt that the decision of Lanman's case was correct, and that when a term expires by constitutional limitation it is not a "vacancy" which the executive can fill.'

"Senator Butler, in the Phelps case in 1854, said:

"'It must be conceded that the authority to choose a Senator to commence a new term of six years, after the efflux of a regular term, is exclusively vested in the State legislature.'

"And referring to the Lanman case, he said:

"'In 1825 Lanman's case came up for consideration involving both questions. In that case, after a very full debate, it was solemnly decided that it was not competent for the governor of a State to put a member on this floor at the commencement of a term. In other words, it was decided that his power of appointment could not be substituted for the election of the State legislature. Even if such had not been the decision in the case of Lanman, I take it for granted that such would be, and must necessarily be, the decision now.'

"In the great debate of 1852, Jefferson Davis, then a Senator from the State of Mississippi, said:

"'Sir, there are two modes of electing Senators—the one by the legislature of a State, the other by executive appointment. And how comes it, Mr. President, that there are two modes? It is well to understand the reason. It was foreseen by the framers of the Constitution that vacancies would occur—would "happen," as the Constitution expresses it—during the "recess" of the legislature of a State, and consequently that a State would be deprived of its representation, for a time at least, unless that vacancy could be supplied. Hence, it gives to the executive of a State the power of a temporary appointment, as the Constitution expresses it, a temporary appointment to hold until the legislature, as I shall show you, has had an opportunity to appoint; and when the legislature has once had that opportunity and declined or omitted to exercise its power, the executive no longer has any power over the subject. It has been justly enough observed here that the word "until," in the clause of the Constitution, qualifies the word "power;" that is, he shall appoint to hold until the legislature discharges that duty, or has an opportunity to discharge it.'

* * * * * * *

"The other day the Senator from Maryland read a letter from Senator Edmunds—and I am apprehensive that all the Senators did not hear it, and I am therefore going to repeat it—written September 1, 1885.

"Mr. BACON. Written by whom?

"Mr. BURROWS. By Senator Edmunds, in relation to the Oregon matter.

"'BURLINGTON, VT., September 1, 1885.

"'DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 21st ultimo. The Constitution, as you know, provides respecting Senators that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy."

"'It has been held by the Senate, and may now be considered as the settled law of that body, that if a State legislature has once acted or had an opportunity to act while a vacancy exists, the governor has no power to supply the failure of the legislature to fill it up.

"'Applying this rule to the case of Oregon, a vacancy existed on and after the 4th day of March, 1885, and your legislature, as I understand it, continued to sit a long time after that date and had the opportunity to fill the vacancy, so that the vacancy did not happen during a recess of the legislature, and it now only exists because the legislature failed in its duty of keeping its Senatorial representation full.

"'If we construe this clause of the Constitution as some Democratic Presidents have the corresponding clause respecting the President filling vacancies in offices, so as to make it mean that if vacancies happen to exist during any recess the governor may fill them, it would be an indefinite power to be exerted just so long as the legislature failed, which is not according either to the language or spirit of the Constitution. But, however we may reason about it, the Senate will be obliged to reverse its repeated decisions on the subject in order to admit a Senator appointed by the governor under such circumstances. Trusting that in some way a Republican Senator from Oregon may be preserved to us at a time when the only security for safe and conservative government lies within the Senate.

"'I am, very truly, yours, GEORGE F. EDMUNDS.'

"Will the Senate read the opinion of this great constitutional lawyer out of the record and trample his words under foot?

* * * * * * *

"In this connection I desire to call special attention of the Senate to the case of Kensey Johns, which arose in 1794, only five years after the organization of the first Senate, in which body there were a considerable number of members who had previously been members of the Constitutional Convention, and, of course, participated in the framing of this provision of the Constitution, and whose opinions, therefore, should command great weight. It is said—

"'That contemporary construction put upon the language or meaning of a constitution at the time of its adoption, or shortly after, by members of the convention which framed it, is properly resorted to to illustrate and confirm the text, to explain a doubtful phrase, or to expound an obscure clause.'

"The opinion of members of the Senate at that time, who were members of the Constitutional Convention, ought, therefore, to come to us with very great force.

"The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner] very well said recently, in his remarks on this case, in reply to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Wellington]:

"'He has invoked the lessons and the actions of the past. I agree with him that profound respect is to be accorded to the action of prior Senates. I agree with him that the men who acted in this body near the time of the adoption of the Constitution knew quite as much about it as we who come here many, many years after its adoption.'

"The Senator then called the attention of the Senator from Maryland to a case which occurred in 1809, the Smith case, and said:

"'No man in that body—it was only twenty years after the adoption of the Constitution, and, I suppose, or have supposed, they knew as much about the Constitution in 1809 as we do in 1900, and cared as much for their obligation to support it as we do.'

"If the opinion of members of the Senate twenty years after the organization of the Government come to the Senator from Wisconsin with so much force, how convincing must be the opinion of the Senate only five years after its organization, when nearly one-fourth of its membership consisted of gentlemen who had been members of the Constitutional Convention? Let me invoke, therefore, the attention of the Senate particularly to this case.

"George Read, a Senator from the State of Delaware, resigned his seat in the United States Senate on the 18th day of December, 1793. The legislature of the State met in January, 1794, and adjourned in February thereafter without filling the vacancy.

"On the 19th of March, 1794, the governor appointed Kensey Johns. There had been a meeting of the legislature between the resignation and the appointment. His credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections of the Senate, consisting of seven members, which committee reported, with only one dissenting vote, that the governor had no power to make the appointment, and Mr. Johns was rejected. True, that was not an appointment by the governor at the beginning of a term, but the same principle was involved, namely, that where the legislature has the opportunity to fill a vacancy happening in the representation of the State in the Senate of the United States, and fails to perform its duty in this regard for any reason, the governor has no power to appoint.

"The determination of the Senate in that case ought to appeal to us with very great force. It came up and was decided within five years after the inauguration of the Government, when Washington was in the executive chair and the men who had participated in the Constitutional Convention were still alive and whose opinions were undoubtedly sought and must have been potential in shaping the judgment of the Senate. More than that, in that very Senate sat several Senators who were members of the Constitutional Convention which considered and framed these provisions of the Constitution now in controversy, and certainly they ought to have known, and unquestionably did know, just what these provisions meant.

"There was Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, a Delegate in the old Congress and the first Senator from that State; Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, who had served in the old Congress, been a judge of the superior court, elected a Senator from that State, afterwards appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States by President Washington, and subsequently became minister to France; Rufus King, of Massachusetts, a Delegate in the old Congress, member of the State legislature, who subsequently became a Senator from the Empire State and minister to England; John Langdon, of New Hampshire, of legislative experience in the old Congress, elected to the Senate in 1789, and became President pro tempore of that body; and Alexander Martin, of North Carolina, speaker of the State senate and governor of his State.

"All these Senators who participated in the work of framing the Constitution of the United States voted that Mr. Johns was not entitled to a seat, and admission was refused him by a vote of 20 to 7. It is no violent presumption to assume that these Senators, who were members of the Constitutional Convention and participated in its formation, knew what they were doing when they voted that the governor had no power to appoint Kensey Johns.

"I desire to read from the Official Record, the Annals of Congress, Third Congress, the proceedings of the Senate in this case in detail.

"'Kensey Johns appeared and produced his credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator for the United States, which were read. Whereupon, it was moved that they be referred to the consideration of the Committee of Elections before the said Kensey Johns should be permitted to qualify, who are directed to report thereon; and it passed in the affirmative.

"'Thursday, March 27.

"'The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States. On motion that the report be recommitted, it passed in the negative; and, after progress, it was ordered that the further consideration of this report be postponed until to-morrow.

"'Friday, March 28.

"'The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

"'"The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware of Kensey Johns as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report:

"'"That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of December, 1793, and during the recess of the legislature of said State.

"'"That the legislature of the said State met in January and adjourned in February, 1794.

"'"That upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid.

"'"Whereupon the committee submit the following resolution:

"'"Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the legislature of said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.'"

"'On the question to agree to this report it passed in the affirmative—yeas, 20; nays 7.'

"From this report of the Committee on Elections, which consisted of Bradley, Elsworth, Mitchell, Rutherford, Brown, Livermore, and Taylor, it will be observed that the committee reported against the right of Kensey Johns to a seat, upon the express ground that—

"'A session of the legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.'

"That being the case, it was the duty of the legislature to elect. The report was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 20 yeas to 7 nays. It is worthy of note in this connection that the Committee on Elections, which gave this case special preliminary consideration, consisted of seven Senators, among whom was Elsworth, who was one of the most conspicuous members of the Constitutional Convention and of whom the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] very properly said the other day in debate:

"'Than whom there was no greater statesman and constitutional lawyer on the face of the earth anywhere.'

"And he, as a member of this committee, not only reported against the right of the governor to appoint in that case, but on the final vote in the Senate voted to keep the seat empty and that the State should go unrepresented of one Senator until a Senator had been properly elected. He did not regard it so important to keep the Senate full, even when it consisted of but thirty members, as to admit to membership anyone not lawfully commissioned. Elsworth, it must be remembered, was not only the 'greatest lawyer on earth,' and a member of the Constitutional Convention, but he was also a member of the committee of detail to amplify and give expression to the principles of government which the convention had adopted, and was, therefore, specially qualified to speak, and his opinion in this case comes to us with peculiar force. It is not saying too much of Mr. Elsworth that he was not only one of the most active members of the Constitutional Convention, but one of the most influential, and when he gave his interpretation of this provision of the Constitution, it ought to come home to the members of the Senate to-day, as it did to the Senate then, with convincing power.

"Mr. President, we have reached a crisis in the history of the Senate fraught with the utmost peril, not only to the Senate but to the country. The eyes of the nation are upon us. What we do to-day will not be overlooked or forgotten. We can not change front unnoticed. We are not sitting behind closed doors. The Senate can not afford to reverse its record of one hundred and eleven years. It can not afford to reject a claimant for a seat to-day and, on the same state of facts, admit another claimant to-morrow. It can not afford to give credence to the charge that the Senate of the United States is, after all, but a social club, where good-fellowship is a better credential than a certificate of election in conformity to law. In a word—we can not afford to do that which defies all precedent, strikes a fatal blow to the perpetuity of the Senate as constituted under existing forms of law, and shakes public confidence in the integrity of this body.

"But 'to this issue it has come at last.' The long and unbroken line of precedents, stretching over a century of national history, builded by the considerate judgment and patriotic solicitude of the great men who have gone before us, strengthened by the approving judgment of the Senate but two years ago, which has stood through all these years as a bulwark against the assaults of partisan zeal and the more insidious assaults of favoritism, is at last to be broken down and demolished, and this great council of States exposed to political intrigue and the machinations of ambitious men.

"Mr. President, when this work of demolition has been consummated, if it must be, and the people realize that the Senate, trampling under foot the precedents of a century, has solemnly adjudged that it will receive into its membership the appointees of governors whenever the legislature fails to elect or can be prevented from choosing a Senator; that governors may fill the seats in this Chamber whenever vacant for any cause, though themselves conspirators to produce vacancies; that the Senate itself, with the cooperation of State executives, will hereafter make up the membership of this body out of their personal or political friends, independent of the legislatures and regardless of the will of the people—when that time comes, I repeat, there will come with it the remedy, swift and complete. The people will not submit to it. They ought not to submit to it. They are wedded to representative government and they will not permit it to be subverted. There is yet a power mightier than Senates, more potent than Senators—a power that can make and unmake both.

"And let me say to Senators that no sooner shall you establish the doctrine contended for by the minority than there will be a popular uprising in this country which no power can resist or suppress to take from State legislatures and governors all control over the election of Senators and lodge it with the sovereign people. Already 34 States, through their legislatures, have demanded it. The House of Representatives has repeatedly proposed it.

"I implore Senators therefore to follow the beaten path of the century, in the footsteps of Elsworth, Benton, Vance, Cass, Bayard, Hill, Davis, Garland, Cameron, Douglas, Mason, Blaine, Edmunds, Conkling, Carpenter, and the long line of illustrious men whose genius and learning illumines the way, and so save the Senate from public scandal and reproach, restore and preserve its ancient dignity, and insure the perpetuity of representative government."

WEDNESDAY, April 4, 1900.

The Secretary read the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania."

Mr. Chandler moved to amend the resolution by striking out the word "not."

TUESDAY, April 24, 1900.

The President pro tempore announced that the motion before the Senate was that offered by Mr. Chandler to strike out the word "not" from the pending resolution.

The amendment was rejected by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Carter, Chandler, Clark (Wyo.), Cullom, Daniel, Davis, Deboe, Foraker, Frye, Gear, Hansbrough, Jones (Nev.), McComas, McLaurin, Mason, Morgan, Nelson, Penrose, Perkins, Platt (N. Y.), Scott, Sewell, Shoup, Spooner, Stewart, Sullivan, Taliaferro, Warren, Wetmore, and Wolcott—32.

Nays—Messrs. Allen, Bacon, Bard, Bate, Berry, Burrows, Butler, Clay, Cockrell, Culberson, Hale, Harris, Hawley, Heitfeld, Jones (Ark.), Lindsay, McBride, McCumber, McEnery, McMillan, Martin, Money, Platt (Conn.), Proctor, Quarles, Ross, Simon, Teller, Tillman, Turley, Turner, Vest, and Wellington—33.

A vote was then taken on the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the same was agreed to by the following vote:

[Fifty-sixth Congress, First and second sessions.]

MARTIN MAGINNIS v. WILLIAM A. CLARK, of Montana.

After the resignation by William A. Clark of his seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Montana (see case of William A. Clark, of Montana, supra), the lieutenant-governor and acting governor of the State of Montana, on the 15th day of May, 1900, appointed William A. Clark to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Clark. The governor of the State of Montana, claiming that this appointment was brought about by fraud and collusion, revoked the appointment, and on the 19th day of May, 1900, appointed Martin Maginnis to fill the vacancy aforesaid.

The conflicting claims of Mr. Clark and Mr. Maginnis were laid before the Senate, and a resolution was introduced in the Senate May 25, 1900, to refer the credentials of the claimants to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but no action was taken on this resolution. Mr. Clark did not appear or attempt to claim a seat in the Senate otherwise than by the presentation of his credentials, and the Senate took no action in regard to determining the title of either of the claimants to the seat made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Clark.

The question involved in the case was which appointment was legal and valid, the one made by the lieutenant-governor or the one made by the governor of the State of Montana. This question was not decided by the Senate either directly or indirectly by any action of the Senate in the case.

The history of the case here given consists of the proceedings of the Senate in the case as published in the Congressional Record, a statement of the days on which the resolution to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was debated in the Senate, with a reference to the pages of the Congressional Record containing the same.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 19, 1900.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the following telegram from the governor of Montana:

"BUTTE, MONT., May 18, 1900.

"Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
"President of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: This will inform you and the Senate of the United States that on account of collusion and fraud by Hon. W. A. Clark in resigning and securing an appointment to the Senate by the lieutenant-governor, I have this day disregarded and revoked said appointment by the lieutenant-governor, and have this day appointed Hon. Martin Maginnis, of Montana, United States Senator, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. W. A. Clark. His credentials will be forwarded in due course.

"ROBT. B. SMITH,
"Governor of Montana."

TUESDAY, May 22, 1900.

Mr. Carter presented the following credentials; which were read and laid on the table:

STATE OF MONTANA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Helena, Mont., May 15, 1900.

"Whereas a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the State of Montana in the Senate of the United States, caused by the resignation of Senator William Andrews Clark; and

"Whereas the legislature of said State is not in session, but in recess;

"Therefore, be it known that, pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States, I, A. E. Spriggs, the lieutenant-governor and acting governor of said State, do hereby apoint William Andrews Clark, a citizen and inhabitant of said State, to be a member of the Senate of the United States, to fill the vacancy so caused and existing as aforesaid, to have and to hold the said office and membership until the next meeting of the legislature of this State.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State, at the city of Helena, in said State, this 15th day of May, A. D. 1900.

A. E. SPRIGGS, Acting Governor.

"[SEAL.]

"By his excellency the acting governor:
"T. S. HOGAN, Secretary of State."

FRIDAY, May 25, 1900.

Mr. Carter presented a certificate from the governor of the State of Montana, appointing Martin Maginnis to fill a vacancy in the Senate of the United States, which was read, as follows:

"In the name and by the authority of the State of Montana.

"To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Whereas a vacancy has happened in the representation of the State of Montana in the Senate of the United States by reason of the resignation of William Andrews Clark; and

"Whereas the legislature of said State of Montana is not in session, but in recess;

"Therefore, know ye that I, Robert B. Smith, governor of the State of Montana, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, do hereby appoint Martin Maginnis, a citizen of the United States and an inhabitant of the State of Montana, to be United States Senator for said State of Montana, to fill the vacancy caused as aforesaid; and by virtue of the authority in me vested as aforesaid I do commission him, the said Martin Maginnis, to be United States Senator for Montana, hereby authorizing and empowering him to execute and discharge all and singular the duties appertaining to said office, and to enjoy all the privileges and immunities thereof, until the next meeting of the legislature of said State.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed at Helena, the capital, this 19th day of May, A. D. 1900.

"[SEAL.] ROBT. B. SMITH.

"By the governor:

"T. S. HOGAN, Secretary of State."

The credentials were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Chandler submitted a resolution, which was read and laid on the table, as follows:

"Resolved, That the credentials showing the appointment as Senator from the State of Montana of William A. Clark, signed by Acting Governor A. E. Spriggs, and the credentials showing a like appointment of Martin Maginnis, signed by Governor Robert B. Smith, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that said committee be directed to inquire whether either of said appointees has been duly and legally appointed to a seat in the Senate as Senator from said State of Montana; and if so, to report which of said appointees is entitled to be admitted to the seat."

TUESDAY, June 5, 1900.

Mr. Chandler submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, while making inquiry as to the respective claims of William A. Clark and Martin Maginnis to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana, be authorized to send for persons and papers, to swear and examine witnesses, and to employ a stenographer; that said committee may act by a subcommittee, and may sit during the recess of Congress and during the sessions of the Senate, and that the expenses of the inquiry may be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee."

The resolution submitted by Mr. Chandler on the 25th day of May, 1900, was called up in the Senate December 4, 1900, December 5, 1900, and December 6, 1900 (Cong. Rec., vol. 34, pp. 29, 58, 93); was debated in the Senate December 11, 1900 (Cong. Rec., vol. 34, pp. 216–219), and December 17, 1900. (Ibid., pp. 354, 355.)

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1900.

Mr. Chandler offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be discharged from further consideration of the resolution authorizing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to send for persons and papers in connection with the inquiry concerning the appointments of William A. Clark and Martin Maginnis as Senators from the State of Montana."

The foregoing resolution was laid before the Senate and debated December 20, 1900. (Cong. Rec., vol. 34, pp. 462–466.)

COMPENSATION OF CONTESTANTS.

THURSDAY, February 21, 1901.

Mr. Chandler submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Martin Maginnis the sum of $2,500, in payment of expenses necessarily incurred by him in prosecuting his title to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana under appointment of the governor of Montana."

SATURDAY, February 23, 1901.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Martin Maginnis the sum of $2,000 in payment of expenses necessarily incurred by him in prosecuting his title to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana under appointment of the governor of Montana."

THURSDAY, February 28, 1901.

Mr. Jones, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution reported by Mr. Hoar on the 23d instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

II.

MISCELLANEOUS CASES.

[Third Congress—First session.]

ALBERT GALLATIN,

Senator from Pennsylvania from December 2, 1793, to February 28, 1794.

Albert Gallatin, a native of Geneva, came to Boston, Mass., in 1780. After changing his residence a few times he went, in November, 1783, to Virginia, where he had purchased lands. In October, 1785, he took an oath of allegiance to Virginia. In December, 1785, he purchased a plantation in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, on which he was living in 1793. On the 28th of February, 1793, he was elected from that State to the Senate of the United States, which office he held until February 28, 1794, when it was determined that he was not entitled to his seat, not having been "nine years a citizen of the United States."

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 3d Cong., 1793-'95, within pages 9-61.

It will be observed that the Senate resolved that the doors of the Senate be opened during the discussion upon this contested election. A discussion of the merits of this case, and of the decision of the Senate regarding it, may be found in the "Life of Albert Gallatin," by Henry Adams, pages 119, 120.

MONDAY, December 2, 1793.

The Vice-President administered the oath required by law to Mr. Gallatin, and he took his seat.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the petition of Conrad Laub and others, relative to the appointment of Mr. Gallatin, a Senator of the United States; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1793.

Ordered, That Messrs. Rutherfurd, Cabot, Ellsworth, Livermore, and Mitchell be a committee to take into consideration the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that the Hon. Albert Gallatin, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as is required by the Constitution, and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 31, 1793.

Mr. Rutherfurd reported, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that the Hon. Albert Gallatin, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as is required by the Constitution; which report was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, January 1, 1794.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others.

On motion to postpone the consideration of the report until to-morrow, it was agreed to amend this motion by striking out the word "to-morrow," and to insert in lieu thereof, "Thursday, the 9th instant."

THURSDAY, January 9, 1794.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

On motion,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the report be postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 10, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of Albert Gallatin, a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

[This committee consisted of Messrs. Rutherford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Livermore, and Mitchell.]

The committee, to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that Albert Gallatin, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as is required by the Constitution, report:

That the committee have conferred with Mr. Michael Schmyser, agent for the petitioners, and with Mr. Gallatin; that Mr. Schmyser has declared that the petitioners are ready to adduce proofs in support of the petition at such time as the Senate may think proper to appoint; that Mr. Gallatin states no objection to the trial's commencing at an early day. The committee therefore recommend that the Senate agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That —— be assigned for hearing the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting Mr. Gallatin's right to a seat in the Senate, and that Messrs. Gallatin and Schmyser be furnished with a copy of this resolution.

On motion, it was agreed to postpone the report of the committee, and to take into consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee of elections, to consist of seven, be appointed to report rules for receiving petitions and conducting inquiries relative to the qualifications of a Senator; and that the petition of Conrad Laub and others be referred to the same committee, to state the facts, and that they be authorized to send for persons and papers."

On which a motion was made and seconded to postpone this motion and to take up the following:

"That —— be a committee to ascertain and state to the Senate the facts relative to the time when Albert Gallatin became a citizen of the United States, and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Whereupon a motion was made and seconded to postpone the preceding, and to take into consideration the following motion:

"Resolved, That a committee of elections be appointed, and that the petition of Conrad Laub and others be referred to it, to report their opinion on the merits of the said petition."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, January 13, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

On motion,

Ordered, That a committee of elections, to consist of seven, be appointed, and that the petition of Conrad Laub and others be referred, without prejudice as to any questions which may, upon the hearing, be raised by the sitting member, as to the sufficiency of the parties and the matter charged in the petition, to the same committee, to state the facts, and that they be authorized to send for persons and papers; also, that Messrs. Bradley, Ellsworth, Mitchell, Rutherfurd, Brown, Livermore, and Taylor be this committee.

MONDAY, February 10, 1794.

Mr. Bradley reported from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States; and the report was read.

Ordered, That Wednesday next be assigned to take this report into consideration, and that in the mean time it be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion that the Senate adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the doors of the Senate be opened, and continue open, during the discussion upon the contested election of Albert Gallatin,"

Ordered, That this motion lie on the table until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1794.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday that the doors of the Senate be opened during the discussion of the contested election of Mr. Gallatin. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the doors of the Senate be opened, and continue open, during the discussion upon the contested election of Albert Gallatin.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1794.

On motion that the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others respecting the appointment of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States be postponed until Monday next, it was passed in the affirmative.

MONDAY, February 17, 1794.

The petition of Michael Schmyser, agent for Conrad Laub and others, petitioners against the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States, was presented and read, praying to be heard by counsel.

Ordered, That the prayer of the petition be granted.

The consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States, was resumed, and, after progress, it was ordered that the consideration thereof be postponed until Wednesday next.

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1794.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be further postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1794.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

The report of the committee states the evidence, and concludes with an opinion that to controvert the allegations set forth in the petition against Mr. Gallatin it lays with him to prove his citizenship.

Accordingly Mr. Gallatin presented a written statement of facts, which the President of the Senate read. It contained a narrative of several transactions from the time of Mr. Gallatin's arrival in the Province of Maine, or Massachusetts, about thirteen years ago; of his having contributed by money and his own services as a volunteer in the cause of the Revolution; of his having taken oaths of allegiance and purchased lands in that State, and also in the State of Virginia. In the back parts of the last-mentioned State he had formed an interesting settlement, and had been extremely useful in bringing settlers from Europe. The dates of those transactions and times of his arrival in Pennsylvania and of being sent to the State convention are also recited, up to the time of his being chosen one of their representatives in the Senate of the United States.

After the President had done reading the statement of facts, Mr. Gallatin addressed the Senate by observing that he felt himself rather in an awkward predicament, not knowing whether the counsel for the prosecutors or himself were the proper persons to speak the first, as this preliminary was not yet laid down by the Senate; neither had he provided any counsel. He should have supposed himself in the situation of defendant were it not that the weight of proving the affirmative in regard to citizenship had been laid on him, under which predicament it might perhaps be necessary for him to begin, and after the counsel for the petitioners had spoken that he should then be allowed to close the arguments.

Mr. Livermore was of opinion that the sitting member should begin the debate, as the onus probandi lay with him.

The counsel for the petitioners, Mr. Lewis, rose. He was attended by Mr. Schmyser, one of the members of the senate of Pennsylvania, who, we understand, manages the prosecution on the part of the petitioners. Mr. Lewis hoped he would be permitted to say a few words in the early stage of the business in regard to the manner of conducting it. He recapitulated sundry offices and posts of honor that had been conferred on him, from which he humbly presumed he had gathered much experience, and particularly in cases of contested elections. He would, therefore, beg leave of the honorable Senate to offer an observation before they should determine on the mode of conducting the trial. When the question for postponement, which was debated the other day, was before them the sitting member did then consider himself as defendant, and for an hour had fought phantoms of his own imagination; but now he has changed his ground and desires to have the privileges which belong to the petitioners only, namely, the right of opening the prosecution and afterwards concluding the arguments.

Mr. Gallatin submitted to the decision of the Senate, and said he did not wish to contend for mere matters of form.

Mr. Martin, from North Carolina, thought it immaterial who began or concluded, if in the end the Senate should be enabled to arrive at a just degree of information.

Mr. Jackson, from Georgia, made some observations on the manner of conducting the business. He thought it would be incumbent on the counsel for the petitioners to prove that Mr. Gallatin was not a citizen, &c.

Mr. King, from New York, and some other gentleman of the Senate said a few more words on the motion; it was agreed that the sitting member should begin.

Mr. Gallatin accordingly rose and recapitulated the facts stated in the written paper which he had presented to the President, commenting on each of them as he proceeded. He proved that he had been an inhabitant of the United States for thirteen years, and was one before the peace of 1783 and before the Confederation. He quoted the laws previous thereto respecting aliens, and also the British statutes, and he maintained that they were all done away by the Revolution. He conceived himself a citizen in common with the other citizens of the United States from the time of his first qualifying after his arrival and attachment to the country. He concluded by saying he would reserve the remainder of his defense until after he should hear the counsel on behalf of the petitioners.

Mr. Lewis commenced his speech by observing that he appeared there on behalf of Conrad Laub and other respectable men who complained of the unconstitutionality of admitting Mr. Gallatin to a seat in the Senate. He was glad to find by the gentleman's expressions that the ground of debate had been narrowed into so small a compass, and he would therefore take him up from the argument where he had left off speaking, that of his being a citizen in common of the United States from the time of his qualifying in Massachusetts or Virginia. But in Virginia two oaths are required, and they must be taken in a court, not before a magistrate, to entitle a man to citizenship. He must also be possessed of a certain quantity of property and be a resident for two years. It appears Mr. Gallatin did not remain in Virginia more than two months. [Here Mr. Lewis read the law of Virginia of the 20th October, 1783.] On this law Mr. Lewis argued that Mr. Gallatin had not gone through the necessary qualifications to entitle him to citizenship there; and he observed that he admired the gentleman's candor in not insisting on it here. In this State he had certainly not qualified himself agreeably to the law. Under these circumstances Mr. Lewis, for his part, could never admit of the gentleman's right to citizenship so far back as to entitle him to the suffrage of a vote for a seat in the Senate, &c.

The mischievous consequences of permitting such innovations he represented in strong terms; and he called to the recollection of the Senate the conduct of ancient and modern governments on this question. One of the ancient republics made it death for an alien to intermeddle in their politics. The sentiments of antiquity and those of men in modern days proved the justice of these conclusions.

With regard to the arguments of the gentleman respecting his being entitled to be a citizen of the Union, or of any individual State of it, because he had qualified himself to be a citizen of one of them, Mr. Lewis said was a mere bubble, for surely the gentleman was not one of the mass of citizens at the accomplishment of independence.

The doctrine of the old law, which the gentleman says was done away by the Revolution, in respect to aliens may have been so with regard to the British king; it was still, however, virtually in force against the gentleman. But, supposing it to be done away, how do the constitutions of the different States stand on this head? Is it not implied by all of them that certain oaths, residence, and property make the requisites to form citizenship? In Massachusetts a foreigner is not a citizen without he complies with those terms. [Here he quoted page 70 of the small volume of the laws of Massachusetts. He also cited the act in favor of John Jarvis and others; also page 104 of the same book and pages 191 and 192.] From these he maintained that no such wild idea was ever contemplated by either the law of Massachusetts or Virginia as to admit foreigners or persons from other States to citizenship immediately on their entrance within their limits.

The situation of the sitting member with respect to the constitution and laws of Pennsylvania he had little doubt was similar to what he had mentioned in regard to the other States, although he would not assert it as a fact. [He read the forty-second section and also in page 43 of the Law of Pennsylvania, 13th of March, 1789, a proviso which contains some precautions requiring records to be kept by the master of the rolls of the persons admitted to citizenship.] The same principle pervades all the States as well as it does the Constitution of the United States. The absurdity of applying it in any other sense was severely pictured by Mr. Lewis, and to admit the idea advanced by the sitting member was as inadmissible as it was novel. In support of what he wished to impress on the minds of the Senate Mr. Lewis quoted the first volume of the Journals of Congress in 1774 and 1775, pages 28 and 29. He then recurred to Blackstone, vol. 1, pages 63, 64, and 69; also 73 and 79.

It was not his intention to quote the parliamentary laws of England in support of anything, but such parts of their common law as could be got over—that common law of England which was imported by our ancestors and handed down to them by the people, not the Parliament. The people had made the common law from time to time. The Saxons, Normans, &c., were all concerned in making and improving it until it had finally reached that degree of perfection in which it was given to us by our ancestors, and it was founded in wisdom and justice.

Mr. Lewis next quoted first Blackstone, 402, which was one of the British laws that had never been admitted in this country and which he hoped never would, viz: That wherein the distinction is drawn between the commoner and the peer, an oath being required of the commoner upon all occasions, and no more than "upon my honor" from a peer, except in giving evidence in civil or criminal trials.

Mr. Lewis concluded by saying that the difficulties which stood between Mr. Gallatin and his seat were insurmountable and could not be removed without showing a law of Massachusetts, Virginia, &c., repealing those laws in regard to the qualification of citizens which he had mentioned, but which repeal he was certain did not exist. He therefore stated that to insist upon the gentleman's right to a seat was both novel and absurd. These were his opinions, which he had given in a perfectly extempore way, not having been allowed time nor expecting to meet the subject on the new ground which it had this day taken in the Senate.

Mr. Gallatin said he would pledge himself to the Senate to prove that the grounds of his arguments and his construction of the confederation and laws of the States was neither novel nor absurd, except in Mr. Lewis's construction of them, but had been admitted in many instances. However, as the common law of England was now introduced by Mr. Lewis, which was new ground to him, and as the hour of adjournment was nearly approaching, he would beg leave to make his reply to-morrow.

On motion, the further consideration of this subject was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 21, 1794.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

Mr. Gallatin commenced his defense by laying down the principles on which he intended to argue. His was a very serious situation for a person to be placed in who had been so long in America and who had mingled with the inhabitants in the common cause, that he should afterwards be called before so solemn a tribunal with an intention to wrest from him his right of citizenship. He confessed that on this occasion his feelings were deeply interested, particularly as the manner of the counsel for the prosecutors was so personal and went not only to deny him a seat in the Senate of the United States, but even to contest his citizenship and denounce him as being yet an alien.

This was a matter of consequence to many thousands as well as himself who have long considered themselves in possession of all the privilege of denizens and yet may be deprived of their rights if the doctrines of the counsel for the prosecutors should obtain any sanction from the body who were now to judge of its merits.

Mr. Gallatin entered into a series of observations on the various points of law, &c., which had been adduced by Mr. Lewis, and he particularly remarked that the common law of England was entirely inapplicable to the subject under consideration. He read the laws of Virginia respecting naturalization, &c., from which he insisted that he had long since become a citizen of the United States. He also quoted first Blackstone, page 374, and Viner's Abridgment, Vol. II, page 266, respecting the different acceptations of denizen and citizen, and he went back so far as the British statutes in 1740 to show the intention of the old government was to naturalize all persons who would go and reside in the Colonies. He next mentioned the act of Pennsylvania of 31st of August, 1778, and commented on the principles generally entertained by most writers on the subjects of allegiance and citizenship—Blackstone, 266, &c.

An alien is a man born out of the allegiance of the king. But allegiance in England is not an allegiance to the country or to society as it is understood in this country.

In order to explain the principle of reciprocity, he observed that when the two crowns of England and Scotland were united under James the inhabitants of Scotland became naturalized in England as if they had been natural-born subjects of that country. The allegiance in Britain was personal to the king, and it has there this remarkable quality that by the British laws allegiance can never be shaken off.

This country, before the Revolution, owed allegiance to the king, but that was destroyed by the Declaration of Independence, and then the inhabitants of the States became mutually citizens of every State reciprocally; and they continued so until such time as the States made laws of their own afterwards respecting naturalization.

As soon as separate governments existed allegiance was due to each, and here the allegiance was a reality, it was to the Government and to society, whereas in Britain it is merely fictitious, being only to one man.

Every man who took an active part in the American Revolution was a citizen according to the great laws of reason and of nature, and when afterwards positive laws were made they were retrospective in regard to persons under this predicament; nor did those posterior laws invalidate the rights which they enjoy under the Confederation.

Mr. Gallatin here mentioned his having been an inhabitant of Massachusetts before October, 1780, and he also observed that the law passed in that State was decisive against the common law of England.

In quoting the laws of Massachusetts, which were passed in 1785 and afterwards, for naturalizing John Gardner and James Martin, he remarked that they clearly implied that even a natural-born subject who had not acted in the Revolution and an absentee was not entitled to citizenship. He likewise took notice of the case of Mr. William Smith, of South Carolina, against whose election as a Representative in Congress a petition was presented by Dr. Ramsey, although the decision of South Carolina on that subject was exactly the reverse of Massachusetts.

In speaking of the difficulties that occurred in explaining the terms citizen and alien he ran over a number of cases and asked whether if a person had arrived in the United States during the war, from Nova Scotia or elsewhere, and had taken an active part against the enemy, would he not be better entitled to the right of a citizen than even those who afterwards subscribed to the acts? The counsel for the prosecutors had admitted that a person who had been one of the mass of the people at the Declaration of Independence was a citizen. On the same principle, until a law passes to disprove that a man who was active in the Revolution previous to the treaty of peace was a citizen he must be one ipso facto.

Mr. Gallatin next read a quotation from the first volume of Woodison, page 382, an English writer who acknowledged that all persons were aliens at the recognition of independence, and that is a more liberal construction than the counsel for the petitioners would admit of, for by his construction our sailors, &c., ought to be naturalized, lest they be alarmed by the British.

The new Constitution of the United States requires certain qualifications for members of Congress, &c., but it does not deprive persons of their rights who were actually citizens before this Constitution was ratified that made the States the United States. They were united by consent before, and consequently he was one of the people before the United States existed.

He went on to read from the constitution of Massachusetts and several other States sundry clauses in support of his reasoning, and recapitulated the several heads of Mr. Lewis's arguments, to each of which he replied.

Mr. Gallatin said that Mr. Lewis was unfortunate in producing the law of Pennsylvania, for by proving too much he had proved nothing, for the forty-second section of the constitution is retrospective and by acknowledging the Articles of Confederation to be the supreme law of the land persons who were reciprocally citizens before are still left in full possession of the right.

So far from any dangerous consequences arising on my construction of citizenship, said he, I think it must be evident that there is more danger and absurdity in the counsel's own constructions. For in remarking on the policy of nations we find even slaves have been enfranchised by the great republics in times of common danger. The policy of America should be to make citizenship as easy as possible for the purpose of encouraging population; even during the British dominion that was a principle laid down, and afterwards it was attempted to be varied; it is made one of the principal subjects of complaint in the Declaration of Independence, where it is expressly said that the king endeavored to prevent the population of these States by having laws made to obstruct the naturalization of foreigners.

If there was any dangerous consequences to be apprehended from the former regulations on this subject they are all remedied by the new Constitution.

Therefore no ill consequence or absurdity can follow. The author of the Federalist supports this principle in Vol. II, page 54, for he says that it is a construction scarcely avoidable that citizens of each of the States are mutually so in all of them.

The first words in the Constitution, "We, the people," furnished another argument in support of Mr. Gallatin's principles, which he turned to great advantage, still drawing an inference to show that Mr. Lewis's construction of the subject was most liable to difficulties and to mischievous consequences.

He concluded by observing that if there was any disfranchising clauses in the Constitution of the United States tending to deprive citizens of antecedent rights, all such clauses must be construed favorably, and were evidently on his side. With regard to a sentence that had been added by the advice of counsel to the affidavit of Pelatiah Webster, he made some remarks which tended to establish his own personal character, which he trusted would be found, when traced back to his nativity, to stand the test; and that his right to a seat in the Senate would also stand upon an equally just foundation.

Mr. Lewis denied ever having seen the affidavit of Mr. Webster until it was shown him at the time the examination before the committee was going forward.

Mr. Gallatin recriminated that the clause of which he took notice was not in the affidavit when Mr. Webster brought it to the committee, and that he had permitted it to be added with great reluctance. It was only the recital of a few words which passed between Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Webster in jest some years since, wherein Mr. Gallatin had ironically said his name was Sidney, probably alluding to some essays that had appeared in the newspapers under that signature which have been generally attributed to the pen of another gentleman in this State.

Mr. Jackson, in order to bring the merits of the subject directly before the Senate, said he would move a resolution that would have that effect; but upon Mr. Lewis's observing that he had not yet closed his arguments, and at the instance of Mr. Butler, from South Carolina, who said he would second Mr. Jackson's motion hereafter, it was withdrawn for the present.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

SATURDAY, February 22, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

The greater part of the day was taken up by Mr. Lewis's pleadings, wherein he entered into a very extensive field of reasoning, and quoted a great number of authorities in support of the principles on which he had set out last Thursday, and to prove that in the true sense of the Constitution of the United States, as well as of that of the State of Pennsylvania, Mr. Gallatin was not duly qualified for the office of a Senator, and therefore he trusted that the honorable Senate, upon mature reflection, would vacate his seat.

Mr. Gallatin closed his defense in a short speech, wherein he quoted Vattel, page 167, and explained the forty-second section of the constitution of Pennsylvania, the liberal construction of which, he said, was in his favor, and the construction contended for by the counsel absurd. He finished by reading a passage from Lord Bacon's works to show that where there is any doubt in the laws it should operate in favor of the defendant, and he accordingly made no doubt but that the Senate would validate his election.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday next.

A motion was made as follows:

"Resolved, That Albert Gallatin, returned to this House as a member for the State of Pennsylvania, is duly qualified for, and elected to, a seat in the Senate of the United States."

Ordered, That the consideration of this motion be postponed until Monday next, and that a number of copies of the fourth article of the First Confederation of United States be printed for the use of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 24, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 22d instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States; and,

After progress,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, February 25, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 22d instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States; and,

After progress,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 26, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 22d instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States; and,

After progress,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 27, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made the 22d instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States; and,

After progress,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 28, 1794.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the 22d instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States, and,

On the question to agree to the motion, as follows:

"Resolved, That Albert Gallatin, returned to this House as a member for the State of Pennsylvania, is duly qualified for, and elected to, a seat in the Senate of the United States,"

It passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gunn, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Hawkins, Izard, King, Livermore, Mitchell, Morris, Potts, Strong, and Vining.

On motion that it be

Resolved, That the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States,

A motion was made to divide the question at the word "void;" and

On motion to agree to the first paragraph of the motion so divided, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Hawkins, Izard, King, Livermore, Mitchell, Morris, Potts, Strong, and Vining.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gunn, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

On motion to adopt the resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States,"

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Hawkins, Izard, King, Livermore, Mitchell, Morris, Potts, Strong, and Vining.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gunn, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

Resolved, That an attested copy of the resolution of the Senate, declaring the election of Albert Gallatin to be void, be transmitted by the President of the Senate to the executive of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.

[This committee consisted of Messrs. Bradley, Ellsworth, Mitchell, Rutherford, Brown, Livermore, and Taylor.]

The report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, above referred to, and made on the 10th instant, is as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, against the election of the Hon. Albert Gallatin as a Senator of the United States for the State of Pennsylvania, report:

That they have had the same under consideration, and, having given due notice, as well the petitioners, by their agent, Michael Schmyser, as the said Mr. Gallatin appeared before them, and, on the part of the petitioners, the following evidence was produced, to wit:

Robert Morris, esq., being duly sworn, deposeth: "That during the war two of his sons went to Geneva for their education, and that at that place they became acquainted with some of the friends of Mr. Albert Gallatin, who had gone for America, and they being solicitous to hear of his safety, desired Mr. Morris's sons to write to their father to make inquiry and give the information he should obtain. That frequently afterwards he received letters for Mr. Gallatin from Europe, which he always supposed to come from the friends of Mr. Gallatin in Geneva. He supplied Mr. Gallatin with money for a bill upon London, and there supposed the funds to pay the same were remitted from Geneva. Mr. Morris paid Mr. Gallatin about one thousand guineas, by order of Messrs.——— ——— & Co., bankers in Paris, believing always that they were reimbursed from Geneva. Mr.

Morris does not recollect dates, not having for a long while seen any of the letters that passed on the subject; he does not know the place of Mr. Gallatin's nativity, but from the general course of the circumstances which came under his observation he always did suppose he was born in Geneva.

"Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

Nathaniel Cabot Higginson, esq., being duly sworn, deposeth: "That he does not know directly anything of Mr. Gallatin's being a foreigner or native; that he recollects knowing him by reputation and sight at Boston, in one of the years 1781, 1782, or 1783, and that he was generally reputed to be a foreigner. This deponent believes that Mr. Gallatin then taught the French language, and did not speak the English with facility; and further recollects that Mr. Gallatin was resident there or thereabouts a considerable time. This deponent further says that he never had any conversation with Mr. Gallatin, but founds his belief with respect to Mr. Gallatin's not speaking the English with facility on the information received from others.

"Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

Mr. John Breakbill, being duly sworn, testifies: "That last winter, being a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, previous to the election of Senator for the State of Pennsylvania, I heard Mr. Gallatin say his citizenship would not admit his being a Senator; what were his reasons for making the declaration I cannot say; I took it he did not wish to be elected. This declaration by Mr. Gallatin was made at a meeting of a number of members of the Pennsylvania legislature, held for the purpose of agreeing who should be set up as a candidate. The deponent further says he does not recollect Mr. Gallatin's assigning any other reason for his backwardness to serve as a Senator than the want of citizenship.

"Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

Henry Kammerer, esq., being duly sworn, testifies: "That last winter, being a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, and previous to the election of Senator for the said State, at a meeting of a number of the members of the State legislature to agree upon a candidate to fill said office, I heard Mr. Gallatin say when his name was proposed, 'As for my name, it is out of the question; I have not been a citizen long enough to entitle me to serve in that station.' That at a second meeting for the same purpose Mr. Gallatin was again proposed as a proper person for a candidate, and then the deponent understood (not from Mr. Gallatin, but from some of the members of assembly then present) that the doubt about his citizenship was then put to rights; and then it was almost unanimously agreed to put up Mr. Gallatin's name. That on the morning succeeding Mr. Gallatin's election the deponent heard it observed that notwithstanding Mr. Gallatin's election he could not take his seat, in consequence of his declaration that he had not been long enough a citizen. That he the same day mentioned this to Mr. Gallatin, who said that he had made this declaration under a mistaken idea that it was necessary for him to have been nine years a citizen of Pennsylvania, but that upon examining the Constitution he had found that to have been nine years a citizen of the United States was sufficient, and that he had been above nine years a citizen of the United States, or words to that effect.

"Sworn to and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

Pelatiah Webster, being duly qualified, testifies: "That eleven years ago last summer I let my house in Philadelphia to Mary Linn, who proposed to take lodgers; I reserved apartments for myself and boarded with her. Soon after Mr. Savery and Mr. Gallatin took lodgings of her and continued a number of months there. Mr. Savery spoke no English; Mr. Gallatin spoke good English and served as interpreter for him. They appeared to be well-bred gentlemen, and their conduct was agreeable and conciliating, and they soon gained the esteem and respect of the family. I do not know that they ever declared their country, but we all supposed they were French, and of course the people, customs, and country of France often made the topic of fireside chat. In one of these transient conversations Mr. Gallatin took occasion to say that his knowledge of French affairs was not very perfect, for he was not a native of France, nor had ever resided long in that country, but was from Geneva. No one interesting circumstance made any further inquiry necessary, nor do I recollect that he made any more explication of the subject.

"N. B. Mr. Gallatin once said that his original name was not Gallatin, but I think he said it was Sidney, but this conversation was in drollery, and not in earnest, as I conceived at the time of speaking from the manner and air of his speaking thereon.

"Sworn to and subscribed, January 28, 1794."

Mr. John Smilie, member of the House of Representatives of the United States, being sworn, saith: "That at a meeting of sundry members of the legislature of Pennsylvania, previous to Mr. Gallatin's election as a Senator of the United States, that gentleman was mentioned as a proper person to fill the said office; at which time Mr. Gallatin started some doubt respecting his being qualified, but in what words the deponent does not recollect.

"That the deponent did not understand upon what the doubt was founded, though he thinks from something said by Mr. Gallatin that it related to Mr. Gallatin's citizenship, for, as the deponent conceived, the conversation proceeded from that kind of modesty which gentlemen usually feel upon having their names proposed upon such occasions, he did not pay much attention to it, and that his reason for forming this opinion was his having frequently observed gentlemen to make excuses in similar situations, and from his knowledge of Mr. Gallatin's modesty of disposition. When being asked whether he ever heard Mr. Gallatin say that he had not been a citizen of the United States nine years previous to his election, the deponent replies he never did. Upon being asked by Mr. Lewis, counsel for the petitioners, what he had ever heard Mr. Gallatin say touching his citizenship, the deponent replies that a considerable time subsequent to Mr. Gallatin's election Mr. Gallatin, in conversations with the deponent, expressed an opinion that he was qualified with respect to citizenship. What else did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say with respect to his citizenship? The deponent answers that he recollects having heard him say something with respect to the laws of Massachusetts not requiring an oath of allegiance at the time of his giving his opinion as aforesaid. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say he was born in Europe? The deponent replies that he does not recollect Mr. Gallatin's saying that he was born in Europe, but that he has heard Mr. Gallatin speak of himself as a Genevan, mention his family in Geneva, and in conversations with him hath always understood him to be of Geneva. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin mention the time of his coming into America? He replies that he thinks Mr. Gallatin, about a year past, mentions that he had been then thirteen years in this country, and that he was nineteen years old when he came. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say when or where he took the oath of allegiance? He replies he heard Mr. Gallatin say that he took the oath of allegiance in Virginia, but as to the time the deponent cannot be precise, but he thinks, if he can recollect, that Mr. Gallatin did mention to him, though he cannot be certain; but it was not nine years before he was elected. That the deponent thinks Mr. Gallatin's doubts respecting his citizenship were founded on this ground, the witness referring in this part of his testimony to the meeting before mentioned, when these doubts were expressed; but he cannot specify the time of Mr. Gallatin's having mentioned to him the circumstance of his having taken the oath of allegiance.

"Sworn to and subscribed, January 28, 1794."

Mr. Thomas Stokely, being sworn, deposeth and saith: "That some few days before a Senator was chosen for the State of Pennsylvania a meeting was had to fix on a proper person to represent the State in that office; sundry persons were started as candidates, among whom was Mr. Gallatin, who, upon his being named, observed that there were many other persons more proper to fill that office; and also observed that there might be doubts as to his citizenship, though the deponent, from the length of time, and not expecting to have been called upon, retains too slight an impression of what then passed to be able to recollect the words with precision. That at a subsequent meeting for the same purpose Mr. Gallatin was finally agreed to be nominated, and the deponent heard no objection stated thereto, either by Mr. Gallatin (who was present) or any other person.

"Sworn to and subscribed, February 1, 1794."

The before-recited evidence being introduced and closed on the part of the petitioners, Mr. Gallatin was asked whether he had any testimony to produce on his part, to which he gave the following answer in writing, to wit:

"The committee to whom the petition of Conrad Laub, &c., was referred, having informed me that the petitioners had closed their evidence, and asked me 'whether I had any testimony to produce on my side,' I answer that it appears to me that there is not sufficient matter charged in the petition and proved by the testimony to vacate my seat; that by the resolution appointing the committee the petition is referred to them to state the facts, 'without prejudice as to any questions which may, upon the hearing, be raised by the sitting member as to the sufficiency of the parties and the matter charged in the petition;' that upon the hearing, and in the present stage of the same, the question as to the sufficiency of matter, as above stated, is raised by me; that I conceive from the evident construction of the resolution I have a right to have that question decided by the Senate; that until the same shall have been decided I do not wish to be at the trouble and expense of collecting evidence at a great distance; and therefore that at present I do not mean to produce any testimony, reserving, however, to myself the right which I conceive I have to produce any testimony in my favor after the said question shall have been decided by the Senate, in case it is decided against me.

"ALBERT GALLATIN."

Which being duly read and considered, the committee came to the following resolution, to wit:

"Whereas the evidence on the part of the petitioners having been closed, and it appearing that Mr. Gallatin was an alien in the year 1780, and his answer in writing assigning reasons why he should not adduce evidence on his part in the present stage of the inquiry not being, in the opinion of the committee, sufficient,

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the committee it is now incumbent on Mr. Gallatin to show that he has become a citizen of the United States, and when."

Which resolution being read to Mr. Gallatin, he informed the committee he should rely on the answer he had before given.

All which is respectfully submitted to the honorable Senate by the committee.

And subjoined is the statement of facts exhibited by Mr. Gallatin and agreed to between him and the counsel for the petitioners, as mentioned the 20th instant:

"Albert Gallatin was born at Geneva on the 29th day of January, 1761. He left that place for the United States in April or May, 1780; arrived in Boston, Mass., on the 14th or 15th of July of the same year, and has ever since resided within the United States. In October, 1780, he removed from Boston to Machias, in the Province of Maine, in which place and its neighborhood he resided one year, and commenced a settlement on a tract of vacant land. During that time he furnished out of his own funds supplies amounting in value to more than sixty pounds Massachusetts currency to Col. John Allen, who was the commanding officer stationed there, and also superintendent of Indian affairs for the Eastern department, for the use of the American troops, and on several occasions acted as a volunteer under the same officer's command. For the said supplies he received one year after a warrant on the treasury of the State of Massachusetts, which he sold at a considerable depreciation. In October, 1781, he returned to Boston, and in the spring of 1782 was, by a vote of the corporation of the University of Cambridge, otherwise called Harvard College, chosen instructor of the French language of the said university. By the same vote he was allowed a room in the college, the privilege of the commons at the tutor's table, the use of the library, and also the right of having his pay, which depended on the voluntary subscription and attendance of the students, collected by the steward of the institution, together with the other charges against the students for board and education. Those terms he accepted and remained in that station for the term of one year. In July, 1783, he removed to Pennsylvania, and in November of the same year proceeded to Virginia, in which State he had purchased more than one thousand acres of land, and amounting to more than one hundred pounds Virginia currency in value, some time between July and November, 1783. Between this last-mentioned period and the month of October, 1785, he purchased other lands in the said State to a very large amount, and in the said last-mentioned month he took an oath of allegiance to the said State. In December, 1785, he purchased the plantation in Fayette County, in Pennsylvania, on which he has lived ever since. In October, 1789, he was elected member of the convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania, and in October, 1790, 1791, and 1792, he was elected member of the legislature of the same State. On the 28th of February, 1793, he was chosen Senator to represent the said State in the Senate of the United States, and took his seat in December following."

[Fourth Congress—First session.]

HUMPHREY MARSHALL,

Senator from Kentucky from March 4, 1795, to March 4, 1801.

In February, 1796, the Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter from the governor of Kentucky and a memorial from the Representatives of said State, which memorial stated that in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian (two judges of the court of appeals), in which they said that Humphrey Marshall had had a suit in chancery in said court of appeals, in which, it appearing manifest from the records and documents that he had committed a gross fraud, the court had given a decree against him; and that in the course of the investigation he had been publicly charged with perjury. The memorial further stated that the said representatives did not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but requested that an investigation relative thereto might take place. Mr. Marshall was also solicitous that an investigation of the subject should take place in the Senate. It was determined that the memorial could not be sustained; also that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate the consent of the party cannot give it, and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 4th Cong., 1st sess., 1795–'96, within pages 47–59.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1796.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter from the governor of the State of Kentucky, with divers papers accompanying the same.

The letter and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 29, 1796.

On motion by Mr. Marshall,

"That the letter from the governor of the State of Kentucky, with divers papers accompanying the same, communicated to the Senate on the 26th instant, be referred to a committee."

It was agreed to postpone the consideration of the motion until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 2, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 29th of February respecting the letter and papers from the governor of the State of Kentucky; and Ordered, That they be referred to Messrs. Livermore, Ross, King, Rutherfurd, and Strong to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

FRIDAY, March 11, 1796.

Mr. Livermore reported from the committee to whom was referred the letter of the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them; and the report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, March 15, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter of the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them; and,

After debate, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 16, 1796.

Ordered, That the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter of the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, be further postponed.

THURSDAY, March 17, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the governor and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, which is as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Livermore, Ross, King, Rutherford, and Strong.]

That the representatives of the freemen of Kentucky state in their memorial that in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian (who were two judges of the court of appeals), in which they say that Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery in the said court of appeals, in which it appearing manifest from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradictions contained in his own answer, that he had committed a gross fraud, the court gave a decree against him; and that in the course of the investigation he was publicly charged with perjury. That Mr. Marshall, in a publication in the Kentucky Gazette, called for a specification of the charge; to which the said George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, in a like publication, replied that he was guilty of perjury in his answer to the bill in chancery exhibited against him by James Wilkinson, and that they would plead justification to any suit brought against them therefor. That no such suits, as the said representatives could learn, had been brought. The said representatives further say that they do not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but request that an investigation may immediately take place relative thereto.

Your committee observe that the said suit was tried eighteen months before Mr. Marshall was chosen a member of the Senate, and that previous to his election mutual accusations had taken place between him and the judges of the said court relating to the same suit.

The representatives of Kentucky have not furnished any copy of Mr. Marshall's answer on oath, nor have they stated any part of the testimony, or produced any of the said records or documents, or the copy of any paper in the cause, nor have they intimated a design to bring forward those or any other proofs.

Your committee are informed by the other Senator and two Representatives in Congress from Kentucky that they have not been requested by the legislature of that State to prosecute this inquiry, and that they are not possessed of any evidence in the case, and that they believe no person is authorized to appear in behalf of the legislature.

Mr. Marshall is solicitous that a full investigation of the subject should take place in the Senate, and urges the principle that consent takes away error, as applying on this occasion, to give the Senate jurisdiction; but, as no person appears to prosecute, and there is no evidence adduced to the Senate, nor even a specific charge, the committee think any further inquiry by the Senate would be improper. If there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained. They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged by the memorialists why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that in their opinion this presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by the recriminating publications of two men, who take no pains to conceal their personal resentment against him.

Whatever motives induced the legislature of Kentucky to call the attention of the Senate to the above-mentioned publications, the committee are of opinion that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate the consent of the party cannot give it, and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed.

On motion to postpone the consideration of the report until to-morrow, it passed in the negative; and,

After debate, on motion to reconsider the question for postponement, it passed in the negative.

On motion to expunge all the words from "if in the present case," inclusive, to the end of the report, a motion was made to amend the part proposed to be struck out by expunging these words: "of two men who take no pains to conceal their personal resentment," and it was agreed that this motion was not in order.

A motion was made to divide the original motion for striking out, and retain the words from "if in the present case," inclusive, to the word, "innocent," at the end of the first paragraph; and,

After debate, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 18, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, together with the motion made thereon, and under debate yesterday; and a motion was made to amend the motion by expunging from the report all that follows the words, "the memorial could not be sustained;" and,

After debate, the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 19, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them; also the motion made thereon and under debate yesterday, together with the motion for amendment by expunging from the report all that follows the words, "the memorial could not be sustained;" and a motion was made to postpone the report and the motions made thereon, and to take into consideration the following resolution:

"Whereas the honorable the legislature of the State of Kentucky have, by their memorial transmitted by the governor of said State, informed the Senate that Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from the said State, had been publicly charged with the crime of perjury, and requested that an inquiry might be thereupon instituted, in which request the said Humphrey Marshall has united; and it being highly interesting, as well to the honor of the said State as to that of the Senate, and an act of justice due to the character of the said Humphrey Marshall that such inquiry should be had: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Senate will proceed to the examination of the said charge on the —— day of the next session of Congress; that in the opinion of the Senate a conviction or acquittal in the ordinary courts of justice of the said State would be the most satisfactory evidence on this occasion; but that if this should not be attainable by reason of any act of limitation or other legal impediment, such other evidence will be received as the nature of the case may admit and require.

"Resolved, That the Vice-President be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to the governor of the said State."

After debate, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 21, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 19th instant, to postpone the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, together with the motions of amendment made thereon, in order to consider the following resolution:

"Whereas the honorable legislature of the State of Kentucky have, by their memorial, transmitted by the governor of the said State, informed the Senate that Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from the said State, had been publicly charged with the crime of perjury, and requested that an inquiry might be thereupon instituted, in which request the said Humphrey Marshall has united; and it being highly interesting, as well to the honor of the said State as to that of the Senate, and an act of justice due to the character of the said Humphrey Marshall that such inquiry should be had: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Senate will proceed to the examination of the said charge on the —— day of the next session of Congress; that, in the opinion of the Senate, a conviction or acquittal in the ordinary courts of justice of the said State would be the most satisfactory evidence on this occasion; but that, if this should not be attainable, by reason of any act of limitation or other legal impediment, such other evidence will be received as the nature of the case may admit and require.

"Resolved, That the Vice-President be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to the governor of the said State."

And on the question for postponement, it passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Langdon, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Latimer, Livermore, Martin, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherfurd, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

TUESDAY, March 22, 1796.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the governor and the memorial of the representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them.

On the question to expunge these words: "if there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained," it passed in the negative.

On the question to expunge the following words:

"They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If in the present case the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent"—

It passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the next paragraph to read as follows:

"And the committee are compelled by a sense of justice to declare that in their opinion this presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by recriminating publications, which manifest strong resentment against him."

And on the question to expunge the paragraph as amended, it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the last clause of the report to read as follows:

"And they are also of opinion that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate the consent of the party cannot give it; and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed."

On motion to expunge the clause last agreed to be amended, it passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Burr, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Latimer, Livermore, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherfurd, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

Mr. Brown requested and was excused from voting on the question.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the last paragraph but two of the report, beginning with the words "if in the present case," by inserting the words "by the memorialists" after the word "alleged."

On the question to adopt the report as amended, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Latimer, Livermore, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherfurd, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

NAYS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

So the report was adopted, as follows:

REPORT AS ADOPTED.

The committee to whom was referred the letter of the governor and the memorial of the representatives of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, report:

That the representatives of the freemen of Kentucky state in their memorial that in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian (who were two judges of the court of appeals), in which they say that Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery in the said court of appeals, in which it appearing manifest from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradictions contained in his own answer, that he had committed a gross fraud, the court gave a decree against him; and that in the course of the investigation he was publicly charged with perjury. The said representatives further say that they do not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but request that an investigation may immediately take place relative thereto.

Your committee observe that the said suit was tried eighteen months before Mr. Marshall was chosen a member of the Senate, and that previous to his election mutual accusations had taken place between him and the judges of the said court relating to the same suit.

The representatives of Kentucky have not furnished any copy of Mr. Marshall's answer on oath, nor have they stated any part of the testimony, or produced any of the said records or documents, or the copy of any paper in the cause, nor have they intimated a design to bring forward those or any other proofs.

Your committee are informed by the other Senator and the two Representatives in Congress from Kentucky that they have not been requested by the legislature of that State to prosecute this inquiry, and that they are not possessed of any evidence in the case, and that they believe no person is authorized to appear on behalf of the legislature.

mitted the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that in their opinion the presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by the recriminating publications, which manifest strong resentment against him.

And they are also of opinion that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate the consent of the party cannot give it; and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed.

Resolved, That the Vice-President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing report to the governor of Kentucky.

[Fourth Congress—First session.]

WILLIAM BLOUNT AND WILLIAM COCKE, of Tennessee.

The history of the case as here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 4th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 1, 1795–'96, and found within pages 83–122. The case simply shows that Messrs. Blount and Cocke were not admitted to seats in the Senate on papers presented to the Senate May 9, 1796, and purporting to be credentials of being duly elected Senators from the State of Tennessee. It does not show why they were not admitted. There is, however, an allusion to a pending "bill proposing to admit the Southwestern Territory into the Union," which bill was not approved until June 1, 1796. From this it may be inferred that Messrs. Blount and Cocke were not admitted to their seats because the papers purporting to be their credentials of election were of earlier date than that of the admission of Tennessee into the Union. Mr. Blount and Mr. Cocke were again elected August 2, 1796, by the legislature of Tennessee, after its admission as a State, and took their seats in the Senate December 6, 1796.

MONDAY, May 9, 1796.

On motion that a paper purporting to be the appointment of William Blount and William Cocke, respectively, to seats in the Senate, should be read, it was agreed that the motion be postponed till to-morrow.

TUESDAY, May 10, 1796.

Ordered, That the consideration of the paper, purporting to be the appointment of William Blount and William Cocke to a seat in the Senate, respectively, be postponed until Friday next.

SATURDAY, May 21, 1796.

A letter, signed William Cocke, purporting that he is appointed a Senator for the State of Tennessee, and claiming a seat in the Senate, was presented and read.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

MONDAY, May 23, 1796.

A letter, signed William Blount and William Cocke, was read, stating that they have been duly and legally elected Senators to represent the State of Tennessee in the Senate.

On motion,

"That Mr. Blount and Mr. Cocke, who claim to be Senators of the United States, be received as spectators, and that chairs be provided for that purpose until the final decision of the Senate shall be given on the bill proposing to admit the Southwestern Territory into the Union,"

A motion was made to refer the consideration thereof to a committee; and it passed in the negative.

On motion to agree to the original motion, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 12, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Foster, Henry, Langdon, Martin, Potts, Robinson, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Gunn, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Read, Ross, Rutherfurd, Strong, and Trumbull.

WEDNESDAY, June 1, 1796.

On motion by Mr. Martin that it be

"Resolved, That the Hon. William Blount and William Cocke, esquires, who have produced credentials of being duly elected Senators for the State of Tennessee, be admitted to take the oath necessary for their qualification, and their seats accordingly," Ordered, That a paper, purporting to be the credentials of Mr Blount and Mr. Cocke, be read.

And, on the question to agree to the resolution, it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Gunn, Langdon, Martin, Robinson, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Foster, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherfurd, and Trumbull.

[Eleventh Congress—First session.]

STANLEY GRISWOLD,

Senator from Ohio from June 2 to December 11, 1809.

Stanley Griswold had resided in Ohio from September, 1808, till May 18, 1809, when he was appointed by the governor of that State to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate. It was determined that the term of residence or other qualifications necessary to entitle a person to become an inhabitant of the State not being defined either by the constitution or laws of the State, the certificate of the governor that a person was a citizen thereof was sufficient for the Senate to proceed upon, he being otherwise entitled thereto.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 11th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., vol. 1, 1809–'10, within pages 23-37; together with the report of the committee in the case, copied from the original on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

FRIDAY, June 2, 1809.

Stanley Griswold, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State of Ohio to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Edward Tiffin, was qualified and took his seat.

FRIDAY, June 9, 1809.

Resolved, That a committee of elections be appointed.

Ordered, That Messrs. Hillhouse, Giles, Crawford, Franklin, and Robinson be the committee.

On motion by Mr. Hillhouse,

Ordered, That the credentials of Stanley Griswold, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State of Ohio, be referred to this committee.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1809.

Mr. Hillhouse, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Stanley Griswold, esq., appointed a Senator of the United States by the executive of the State of Ohio, made report.

Whereupon,

Resolved, That Stanley Griswold, appointed by the governor of the State of Ohio as a Senator of the United States, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Edward Tiffin, is entitled to his seat.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. Hillhouse, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Ohio of Stanley Griswold as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, reported:

That Edward Tiffin, a Senator for the State of Ohio, resigned his seat since the last session of the legislature of said State, and during their recess. That on the 18th day of May last, and during said recess of said legislature, said Stanley Griswold was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid. That said Stanley Griswold, being a citizen of the United States, removed into the said State of Ohio and has there resided since September last, but the term of residence or other qualifications necessary to entitle a person to become an inhabitant of said State are not, so far as the committee have been able to discover, defined either by the constitution or laws of said State; but the executive who made the appointment having certified that said Stanley Griswold is a citizen of said State, the committee submit the following resolution.

JESSE BLEDSOE,

Senator from Kentucky from March 4, 1813, to December 24, 1814.

January 20, 1815, Mr. Bledsoe addressed a letter to the President of the Senate setting forth these facts: That previous to the 24th of the December preceding he had forwarded his resignation to the governor of the State to take place on that day, to be by the governor communicated to the legislature; that he had been advised by letter that the governor had received the resignation and would hold it up in the hope of hearing from him of a change in his determination on the subject, until about the last of that month, when he (the governor) would communicate it to the legislature; that newspaper information stated that the governor had done so, and that his successor had been appointed, which latter fact he had been informed was also stated in a letter to a gentleman of the House of Representatives; that he had received no more information. Mr. Bledsoe desired to know whether, under these circumstances, he was to be considered still a member of the Senate. It was determined that the facts stated in the letter to the President of the Senate vacated Mr. Bledsoe's seat, the grounds on which the Senate proceeded not being given. It appears from the Journals of the Senate that Isham Talbot produced credentials of election to fill Mr. Bledsoe's unexpired term February 2, 1815, and took his seat on the same day.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Annals of Congress, 13th Cong., 1814–'15, vol. 3, pages 175, 176.

FRIDAY, January 20, 1815.

The President laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. Mr. Bledsoe, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1815.

SIR: Doubts having arisen whether I have a right still to fill my seat in the Senate of the United States, with a view to have the question settled and a precedent established, and to save my own feelings on a point of duty, I beg leave, through you, to submit the following case for the decision of that honorable body:

Previous to the 24th December last I forwarded by mail my resignation to the governor of the State of Kentucky, to take place on that day, to be by him communicated to the legislature of that State then and, so far as I am informed, still in session. I was by a letter from the governor of that State advised that he had received my resignation and would hold it up, in the hope of hearing from me and of a change in my determination on that subject, until about the last of that month, when he would communicate it to the legislature. Newspaper information states that he did so, and that my successor has been appointed, which latter fact is also stated in a letter to a gentleman of the House of Representatives, as I have been informed. This is all the information I have received. Whether, under these circumstances, I am to be considered as still a member will be for the honorable Senate to decide. Wishing it to be understood I have no other solicitude as to the result than to be informed of my duty, which is concerned in continuing in my place if I have a right to do so,

I am, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

J. BLEDSOE.

The Hon. JOHN GAILLARD,
President of the Senate.

And the letter was read.

Whereupon

Mr. Roberts submitted the following motion:

"Resolved, That the facts stated in the letter of the Hon. Jesse Bledsoe addressed to the President of the Senate do not vacate his seat in the Senate."

A motion was made by Mr. King to amend the resolution by striking out therefrom the word "not;" and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 8; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Dana, Lacock, Roberts, Smith, Turner, and Varnum.

On the question, Shall the resolution pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lacock, Lambert, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Wells, and Wharton.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Dana, Roberts, Smith, and Varnum.

So it was

Resolved, That the facts stated in the letter of the Hon. Jesse Bledsoe addressed to the President of the Senate do vacate his seat in the Senate.

[Twentieth Congress—First session.]

EPHRAIM BATEMAN,

Senator from New Jersey from December 7, 1826, till January 12, 1829, when he resigned.

Mr. Bateman's first term expired March 3, 1827. February 26, 1827, his credentials of election for the succeeding term were presented to the Senate. February 28, 1827, a remonstrance of a number of members of the general assembly of the State against the legality of the election was communicated to the Senate and ordered to lie on the table. December 3, 1827, Mr. Bateman took his seat. May 6, 1828, the remonstrance was referred to a select committee of five. It was to the effect that the election ought to be declared null and void for the reason that Mr. Bateman, being chairman of the joint meeting of the two houses of the legislature, had voted for himself. It stated that Theodore Frelinghuysen had 28 votes and Mr. Bateman 29, and claimed that Mr. Bateman was elected "by his own vote, without which he neither could nor would have been elected," and that it was "repugnant to the fundamental principles of our free institutions that the same man, at the same time, should be both candidate and elector." May 22, the committee reported the facts in regard to the election to be as stated in the remonstrance. On a preliminary point discussed, it reported that the Senate was "empowered by the Constitution to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, and could not therefore be precluded by the commission emanating from the executive of a State from any inquiry which is necessary to the exercise of that judgment." On the chief point before the committee it reported that Mr. Bateman "was a member of the legislature of New Jersey, duly elected, and competent to the exercise of every legislative power not forbidden by its laws, among which the right to vote in the election of a Senator was one." The committee recommended the adoption of a resolution discharging the committee from the further consideration of the subject, which was agreed to.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journals, 2d sess. 19th Cong., 1826–'27, and 1st sess. 20th Cong., 1827–'28, with the report of the committee from Senate Documents, 1st sess. 20th Cong., vol 5, Doc. No. 202, pages 1–3.

The documents relating to the case which were printed are found in the volume of Senate Documents above referred to, Doc. No. 202, pages 4–21. It appears from Niles' Register, vol. 34, page 223, that some debate on the subject occurred, in which Messrs. Bateman, Van Buren, and Noble took part; but it is not there reported, nor is it found in the Congressional Debates.

MONDAY, February 26, 1827.

Mr. Dickerson communicated the credentials of the Hon. Ephraim Bateman, appointed a Senator by the legislature of the State of New Jersey for the term of six years, to commence on the 4th day of March next.

WEDNESDAY, February 28, 1827.

The Vice-President communicated a letter from Samuel J. Bayard, James S. Green, and John R. Thompson, inclosing the remonstrances of a number of the members of the legislative council and general assembly of New Jersey and of a number of citizens of that State against the legality of the election by the legislature of Ephraim Bateman to the Senate of the United States from the 3d of March next; and

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 3, 1827.

The Hon. Ephraim Bateman, appointed a Senator by the legislature of the State of New Jersey for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March last, attended, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him and he took his seat in the Senate.

TUESDAY, May 6, 1828.

On motion by Mr. Eaton,

Resolved, That the remonstrance presented to the Senate at the last session against the legality of the election by the legislature of New Jersey of Ephraim Bateman to the Senate of the United States be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. Berrien, Mr. Tazewell, Mr. McLane, Mr. Seymore, and Mr. Sanford be the committee.

Mr. Bateman presented his answer to the remonstrance against his election; and Ordered, That it be referred to the last-mentioned committee.

Mr. Eaton laid on the table two papers relating to the subject of said remonstrance; and Ordered, That they be referred to the last-mentioned committee.

THURSDAY, May 22, 1828.

Mr. Berrien, from the select committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry citizens of New Jersey touching the election of Ephraim Bateman, a Senator from that State, made a report, accompanied by a request to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and the committee was discharged accordingly.

On motion by Mr. Eaton,

Ordered, That the report and the documents connected with it be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MAY 22, 1828.

Mr. Berrien made the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry citizens of New Jersey touching the election of Ephraim Bateman, a Senator from that State, report:

That, by a reference to the proceedings of the legislature of New Jersey, assembled in joint meeting on the 9th November, 1826, of which a duly certified copy has been exhibited by the memorialists, it appears that an election for a Senator, to represent the said State of New Jersey in the Congress of the United States for six years from the 4th day of March then next ensuing, was on that day held; that Theodore Frelinghuysen, Ephraim Bateman, Thomas Chapman, and George K. Drake were put in nomination for the said appointment; that Ephraim Bateman was at that time a member of the said legislature of New Jersey, vice-president of the council and chairman of the joint meeting; that the names of Thomas Chapman and George K. Drake were with leave respectively withdrawn; that the said Ephraim Bateman thereafter withdrew from the chair of the joint meeting, and at his instance William B. Ewing, esq., was called to the same; and, on motion, the same was confirmed by the joint meeting; that, after some discussion as to the manner of proceeding, the said Ephraim Bateman returned to the assembly room and resumed the chair; that the secretary was thereupon directed to call the joint meeting, which being done, the members voting viva voce, it appeared that there were for Theodore Frelinghuysen 28 votes and for Ephraim Bateman 29 votes, and that the said Ephraim Bateman voted for himself, and was accordingly declared to be duly appointed.

It moreover appears to the committee that in virtue of such election, and the commission of the governor of New Jersey founded thereon, the said Ephraim Bateman now holds his seat in the Senate of the United States.

The memorialists object to the validity of this election, because the said Ephraim Bateman, being a member of the legislative council, vice-president of the State, and chairman of the joint meeting of the two houses of the legislature, permitted himself to be nominated as a candidate for the office of Senator in Congress of the United States; that he presided as chairman of the joint meeting during the said election; that, before the vote was taken, he made a motion that he should be excused from voting, because he was a candidate, and therefore interested; and, on the question being put on his said motion, voted that he should not be excused, the other members of the joint meeting being equally divided on the same; and that, on the vote for Senator for six years, the joint meeting, without the vote of the said Ephraim Bateman, being again equally divided, he, the said Ephraim Bateman, voted for himself.

The transcript of the proceedings of the legislature of New Jersey, which has been exhibited to the committee, does not show what motions were made and decided before the joint meeting proceeded to the election of a Senator; but it does show that on proceeding to that election, the votes of the joint meeting were for Theodore Frelinghuysen 28 and for Ephraim Bateman 29, and that Ephraim Bateman voted for himself. The question, therefore, which is presented to the consideration of the committee is whether this act invalidates the election.

On the preliminary point which is discussed in the argument forwarded in behalf of the memorialists, as well as in that submitted by the respondent, and which relates to the right of the Senate to look behind the commission granted by the governor, the committee cannot permit themselves to entertain a doubt.

The Senate is empowered by the Constitution to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, and cannot therefore be precluded by the commission emanating from the executive of a State from any inquiry which is necessary to the exercise of that judgment. If this were not so, the governor of a State, by an abuse of his trust, either from misapprehension or design, might assume to himself the appointing power in exclusion of the legislature.

The question whether the election of the respondent is invalidated by the fact that he voted for himself, and that without such vote he had not a majority of the votes of the joint meeting by which he was declared to be elected, is then forced upon the attention of the committee.

The following clauses of the Constitution of the United States relate to the manner of election:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be chosen by the legislature thereof."

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The legislature of New Jersey has enacted the following provision:

"Senators of the United States on the part of this State shall be appointed by the council and general assembly, in joint meeting assembled, at the place where the legislature shall then sit."

It is manifest from the aforegoing clauses that Congress may prescribe the mode of electing Senators, and that in the absence of any provision by them it is competent to the legislatures of the several States to do so. It seems equally clear that each State must possess the power of defining by its organic law the constituents of its own legislative department, of prescribing the qualifications of its members, and the limitations under which the trust confided to them shall be exercised; and that the interest of a member in any subject of legislative action may be declared to constitute, as to that subject, a ground of disqualification to the exercise of his legislative functions by such interested member. But no such provision exists. For aught that appears to the committee the respondent was a member of the legislature of New Jersey duly elected and competent to the exercise of every legislative power not forbidden by its laws, among which the right to vote in the election of a Senator was one. The committee have not considered the question of the propriety or delicacy of the act complained of by the memorialists as coming within the scope of the reference made to them by the Senate. Nor have they felt themselves at liberty to apply to this question any abstract principles of right or of that system of jurisprudence which, however its principles may have become intermingled with our statutory regulations or its rules of proceeding may be seen to operate in the forms which are in use in our judicial tribunals, has no intrinsic validity in those tribunals or in any other forum in the United States.

Contenting themselves with this brief view of the subject, it appears to the committee that the facts set forth in the memorial referred to them are not sufficient to invalidate the election of Ephraim Bateman as a Senator of the State of New Jersey in the Congress of the United States, under the election had in the joint meeting of the assembly of that State on the 9th day of November, 1826. They therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee raised on the remonstrance and petition of sundry citizens of the State of New Jersey be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

[Twenty-third Congress—First session.]

ELISHA R. POTTER vs. ASHER ROBBINS, of Rhode Island.

February 4 1833, Mr. Knight, of Rhode Island, presented in the Senate the credentials of Asher Robbins, elected a Senator from Rhode Island for the term beginning March 4, 1833, which were read. Mr. Robbins had been elected January 19, 1833; his credentials dated January 28, 1833. December 2, 1833, the first day of the first meeting of Congress in said term, the President of the Senate communicated an act of the State of Rhode Island declaring the election of January 19 void; also credentials of election to the Senate of Elisha R. Potter for the said term. The act had passed in October, 1833. Mr. Potter had been elected November 1, 1833; his credentials dated November 5, 1833. After debate on the question whether Mr. Robbins should be admitted at once to the seat to hold until the Senate should have decided to which of the contestants it belonged, it was determined that Mr. Robbins be admitted to take the oath, which he did December 2, 1833, and the credentials of Mr. Potter were laid on the table. December 5, 1833, the credentials of Mr. Potter were referred to a select committee of five elected by the Senate; and December 9 the credentials of Mr. Robbins were referred to the same committee. Majority and minority reports were made by the committee. The majority reported that the body electing Mr. Robbins was the legislature of Rhode Island; also a resolution "that Asher Robbins, being duly and constitutionally chosen a Senator in Congress from the State of Rhode Island, is entitled to his seat in the Senate," which resolution passed in the affirmative May 27, 1834, by a vote of 27 yeas to 16 nays. The minority reported that the choice of Mr. Robbins was not made by the legislature of the State; that the terms of the governor and senators forming part of that body had expired in May, 1832, before the election of Mr. Robbins; that there had been no new election by the people; and that the act passed in January, 1832, by the legislature, providing that in case of a failure at any annual election by the people of the election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, or a quorum of the Senate, such of those officers who should then be incumbents should continue in office until their successors should be duly qualified, under which act the governor and senators referred to were holding office at the time of the election, was in violation of the charter granted to the State in 1633, and was null and void; and report that Mr. Potter was duly elected.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 1st sess. 23d Cong., 1833–34; the majority report (Report No. 139, Senate Documents, 1st sess. 23d Cong., vol. 2, 1833–'34); and the minority report (Report No. 246, Senate Documents, 1st sess. 23d Cong., vol. 3, 1833–'34), with the exception of certain accompanying documents, which may be found in the volume of Senate Documents containing the report.

The debate on the prima facie right of Mr. Robbins to the seat is found in Congressional Debates, vol. 10, part 1, 1833–'34, pages 2–11. A debate on the right of the minority to make report, and on the question whether a minority report should be responsive to the majority report, is found in the same volume, pages 804–807, 1229, 1230, 1252–1257. Special references to the other debates are inserted below. The vote on agreeing to the resolution reported by the committee was taken without debate.

The references here given are all either to the Senate Journal or to the Congressional Debates (Gales & Seaton). The case is also reported in the Congressional Globe and the Register of Debates (Green).

MONDAY, February 4, 1833.

Mr. Knight communicated the credentials of the Hon. Asher Robbins, appointed a Senator by the legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations for the term of six years, to commence on the 4th day of March next; which were read.

MONDAY, December 2, 1833.

The President communicated an act of the general assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, declaring void the election by the general assembly of that State, on the 19th of January last, of Asher Robbins to the office of Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years from the 3d day of March last; and the certificate of the governor and secretary of that State of the election, by the said general assembly, of Elisha R. Potter to the same office; which act and certificate were read; and,

On motion by Mr. Poindexter,

Ordered, That they be laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. Poindexter that the oath prescribed by law be now administered to Mr. Robbins, whose credentials were received at the last session,

A motion was made by Mr. Benton that said motion be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon.

It was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 19.

[A reference to the debate that took place on the two last motions is given in the head-note, it being pages 2–11 of the references.]

On motion by Mr. Benton, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Benton, Brown, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Silsbee, Smith, Swift, Tomlinson, and Tyler.

The question recurring on the motion by Mr. Poindexter, "that the oath prescribed by law be administered to Mr. Robbins," it was determined in the affirmative; and the oath was accordingly administered to Mr. Robbins and he took his seat in the Senate

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1833.

On motion by Mr. Wright that the proceedings of the legislature of the State of Rhode Island, now upon the table of the Senate, showing the appointment of Elisha R. Potter as a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, be referred to a select committee of five members, to inquire and report upon the claim of the said Elisha R. Potter to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon. Asher Robbins; and,

On motion by Mr. Clay,

Ordered, That the said motion be laid on the table.

[On Mr. Wright's motion was a brief debate on the method of appointment of select committees, which is found on pages 13, 14 of the volume of Congressional Debates above referred to.]

THURSDAY, December 5, 1833.

On motion of Mr. Wright the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by him yesterday, to refer to a select committee the claim of Elisha R. Potter to a seat in the Senate; and it was amended and agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the proceedings of the legislature of the State of Rhode Island, now upon the table of the Senate, showing the appointment of Elisha R. Potter as a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, be referred to a select committee, to be elected by the Senate, to inquire and report upon the claim of the said Elisha R. Potter to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon. Asher Robbins."

Ordered, That Mr. Poindexter, Mr. Rives, Mr. Frelinghuysen, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Sprague be the committee.

MONDAY, December 9, 1833.

On motion by Mr. Poindexter,

Ordered, That the credentials of Mr. Robbins be referred to the select committee appointed on the claim of Elisha R. Potter to a seat in the Senate.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1834.

Mr. Poindexter, from the select committee to whom had been referred the credentials of Asher Robbins, appointed a Senator in Congress from the State of Rhode Island for the term of six years, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1833, and the proceedings of the legislature of said State, convened on the last Monday of October, 1833, declaring void the appointment of said Robbins, and the appointment of Elisha R. Potter for the said term, made a report,* accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Asher Robbins, being duly and constitutionally chosen a Senator in Congress from the State of Rhode Island, is entitled to his seat in the Senate."

[Here followed a debate on the right of the minority of the committee to submit a report, a reference to which is given in the head-note, it being pages 804–807 of the references.]

TUESDAY, April 1, 1834.

On motion by Mr. Wright that he have leave to present to the Senate a paper containing the views and opinions of the minority of the select committee to whom had been referred the appointments of Asher Robbins and Elisha R. Potter, by the State of Rhode Island, to the Senate of the United States.

[A reference to the debate on this motion is given in the head-note, it being pages 1229, 1230 of the references.]

On motion by Mr. Ewing,

Ordered, That it be laid on the table.

FRIDAY, April 4, 1834.

On motion by Mr. Wright, the Senate resumed the consideration of his motion to present to the Senate a paper containing the views and opinions of the minority of the select committee to whom had been referred the appointments of Asher Robbins and Elisha R. Potter by the legislature of Rhode Island to the Senate of the United States; and,

*Found on page 102.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth,

Ordered, That it be laid on the table, and that the said paper, with the documents herein referred to, except those marked G, H, and I, be printed.

[A reference to the debate following Mr. Wright's motion is given in the head-note, it being pages 1252–1257 of the references.]

[The consideration of the report was successively postponed April 10, May 8, May 12, and May 19.]

TUESDAY, May 27, 1834.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the respective claims of Messrs. Robbins and Potter to a seat in the Senate; and, on the question to concur in the resolution with which it concludes, as follows:

"Resolved, That Asher Robbins, being duly and constitutionally chosen a Senator in Congress from the State of Rhode Island, is entitled to his seat in the Senate,"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 16.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Preston, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, and Webster.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, White, Wilkins, and Wright.

[Some remarks on the question of proceeding to a vote without debate are found in the Congressional Debates, vol. 10, part 2, 1833–'34, page 1813.]

COMPENSATION OF MR. POTTER.

THURSDAY, June 5, 1834.

The following motion, submitted by Mr. Wright, was considered and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of providing by law for the pay and mileage of the Hon. Elisha R. Potter from the commencement of the present session of Congress up to the time of the final decision of the contest for a seat in the Senate between the said Potter and the Hon. Asher Robbins, at the rate of pay allowed to the members of the Senate."

TUESDAY, June 10, 1834.

On motion of Mr. Webster,

Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the consideration of the resolution relating to the claim of Elisha R. Potter for mileage and compensation.

FRIDAY, June 12, 1834.

The following motion submitted by Mr. Wright was considered:

"Whereas the Hon. Elisha R. Potter did at the commencement of the present session of Congress cause to be laid before the Senate a commission from the governor of the State of Rhode Island, duly authenticated, and constituting the regular prima facie evidence to entitle him to a seat in the Senate; and

"Whereas the contest for the seat claimed by Mr. Potter was not finally decided by the Senate until the 27th day of May now last past, when the said seat was awarded to the Hon. Asher Robbins: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the said Elisha R. Potter is entitled to the compensation of mileage allowed by law to members of Congress for his travel from his place of residence, in the State of Rhode Island, to the capital, and returning; and also to the per diem allowance of a member of Congress for the time he actually attended at the city of Washington during the contest pending before the Senate in relation to the seat claimed by him and occupied by the Hon. Mr. Robbins."

On motion of Mr. Wright,

Ordered, That it be postponed until to-morrow.

MONDAY, June 16, 1834.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. Wright on the 12th instant, to compensate Elisha R. Potter for mileage and per diem to the 27th ultimo, and Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[Some remarks on the resolution are found in part 2 of the Congressional Debates already referred to, page 2021.]

THURSDAY, June 19, 1834.

On motion of Mr. Clayton,

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the resolution to compensate Elisha R. Potter for mileage and attendance to the 27th ultimo.

The Senate then proceeded to consider said resolution, and it was amended to read as follows:

"Whereas the Hon. Elisha R. Potter did at the commencement of the present session of Congress cause to be laid before the Senate credentials authenticated by the governor of the State of Rhode Island declaring the election of Asher Robbins void, and that said Potter had been elected by the legislature a Senator from the State of Rhode Island; and

"Whereas the contest for the seat claimed by Mr. Potter was not finally decided by the Senate until the 27th day of May now last past, when the said seat was awarded to the Hon. Asher Robbins: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the said Elisha R. Potter ought, under the circumstances of the case, to be paid the compensation of mileage allowed by law to members of Congress for his travel from his place of residence in the State of Rhode Island to the Capitol, and returning; and also the per diem allowance of a member of Congress for the time he actually attended at the city of Washington during the contest pending before the Senate in relation to the seat claimed by him, and occupied by the Hon. Mr. Robbins; and that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to prepare a bill or resolution for that purpose."

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Wright, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Chambers, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Preston, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Tallmadge, Tyler, Waggaman, White, Wilkins, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bell, Black, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, and Webster.

[Some remarks on the resolution are found in part 2 of the Congressional Debates already referred to, pages 2037, 2038.]

MONDAY, June 23, 1834.

[The Senate having under consideration the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1834."]

Pursuant to instruction of a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary,

Mr. Clayton moved further to amend the bill by inserting the following section:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, directed to pay, out of the fund appropriated by law for the pay of members of Congress, to Elisha R. Potter, of the State of Rhode Island, such compensation as is allowed by law to members of Congress, for his travel from his place of residence to the city of Washington to claim a seat in the Senate, and for his return; and also the per diem compensation for the days he was in actual attendance at the seat of Government from the commencement of the present session of Congress until the final decision of the Senate against his right to the seat claimed by him."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 19.

On motion of Mr. Clayton, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Chambers, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Preston, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Tallmadge, Tyler, White, Wilkins, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Black, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Tomlinson, and Webster.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 4, 1834.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Poindexter made the following report:

The select committee to which was referred the credentials of Asher Robbins, chosen a Senator in Congress from the State of Rhode Island for the term of six years, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1833; and also the proceedings of the legislature of said State, convened on the last Monday of October, 1833, declaring the election of the said Asher Robbins void, who thereupon proceeded to elect Elisha R. Potter a Senator in Congress for six years, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1833, instead of said Asher Robbins, whose election to fill said office had been declared void as aforesaid, have had the whole subject so referred to them under their serious and attentive consideration, and submit the following report:

That it appears by the credentials of Asher Robbins and the proceedings of the general assembly of the State of Rhode Island hereto appended, and marked A, that the senate and house of representatives of said State, then sitting in the city of Providence, met in grand committee in conformity to the usage of the legislature in such cases, for the purpose of choosing a Senator to represent said State in the Congress of the United States; and that, on counting the ballots, it appeared that Mr. Robbins was elected by a majority of four votes, who was thereupon declared to be duly elected a Senator to represent said State in the Congress of the United States for six years from and after the 4th day of March then next following; that, having performed the duty for which the two houses had met, the grand committee was dissolved, and the members of each house repaired to their respective chambers. It further appears to your committee that on the 28th day of the same month of January his excellency Lemuel H. Arnold, governor of the State of Rhode Island, by commission in due form, bearing his signature, under the great seal of the State, did proclaim and make known the election of the said Asher Robbins as aforesaid, and caused the said commission, signed and sealed as aforesaid, to be delivered to the said Asher Robbins, which was presented to the Senate of the United States in open session on the 4th day of February, 1833, and on motion read and entered on the journals of the Senate. By virtue of the force and effect of the aforesaid commission, the said Asher Robbins, Senator-elect from the State of Rhode Island, appeared in the Senate Chamber on the 2d day of December, 1833, was duly sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and took his seat as a member of the Senate.

It further appears to your committee that at a subsequent session of the general assembly of Rhode Island, begun and held at the town of South Kingston in said State, on the last Monday of October, 1833, certain proceedings were had relative to the election of the said Asher Robbins as above mentioned, which resulted in the adoption of a declaration or act of the said general assembly, by which the election of Mr. Robbins is declared to be "null and void and of no effect," and the office vacated. Whereupon, at the same session of the general assembly the two houses met in grand committee on the 1st day of November, 1833, and proceeded to elect a Senator to represent the State of Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March preceding, to supply the vacancy created, or supposed to be created, by the act declaring the election of Mr. Robbins null and void; and the majority appearing to be in favor of Elisha R. Potter, the said Potter was thereupon declared to be duly elected a Senator in Congress from the said State for the term aforesaid, when the grand committee was dissolved and the members repaired to their respective chambers. That on the 5th day of the same month of November his excellency John Brown Francis, governor of the State of Rhode Island, by commission in due form, bearing his signature, under the great seal of the State, did proclaim and make known the election of the said Elisha R. Potter as aforesaid, and cause the said commission, signed and sealed as aforesaid, to be delivered to the said Elisha R. Potter, which was presented to the Senate on the 2d day of December last, and on the 5th day of the same month referred to this committee. The documents relating to those proceedings are subjoined and marked B. This statement of the case is deemed sufficient to show the questions which arise for the consideration of your committee, and which they now proceed to examine:

1. Was the commission of Asher Robbins made and executed in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws and usages of Rhode Island prescribing the time, place, and manner of choosing Senators to Congress?

2. Was Mr. Robbins, at the time of his election, eligible, according to the Constitution of the United States, to the office of Senator?

3 Was he chosen by the legislature of the State of Rhode Island?

If these questions be answered affirmatively it will be unnecessary to inquire into the validity of the subsequent election of Mr. Potter, or into the power of the legislature to create a vacancy by annulling the act of their predecessors; and therefore your committee limit the views which they deem it proper to take of the subject referred to them to the objections made to the commission of Mr. Robbins on the ground that the legislature by whom he was chosen had no power to elect a Senator to Congress, and that the governor who signed and sealed his commission was not at the time competent to exercise any power or perform any duty in his official character. These objections rest on the same general principle; and if they are supported by the facts disclosed in the case, connected with the constitution and laws of the State, it will then be proper to examine the claims of Mr. Potter to a seat in the Senate, and not otherwise.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." (Article 1, section 5.)

The members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the several States having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. The members of the Senate are to be chosen by the legislatures of each State, and the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators. Congress having passed no law on the subject, we must look into the statutes of the several States for those regulations and conform our action to them. The Senators from each State are equal in number, and cannot be increased or diminished even by an amendment of the Constitution without the consent of the States respectively. They are chosen by the States as political sovereignties, without regard to their representative population, and form the Federal branch of the National Legislature. The same body of men which possesses the powers of legislation in each State is alone competent to appoint Senators to Congress for the term prescribed in the Constitution. In the performance of this duty the State acts in its highest sovereign capacity, and the causes which would render the election of a Senator void must be such as would destroy the validity of all laws enacted by the body by which the Senator was chosen. Other causes might exist to render the election voidable, and these are enumerated in the Constitution, beyond which the Senate cannot interpose its authority to disturb or control the sovereign powers of the States vested in their legislatures by the Constitution of the United States. We might inquire, was the person elected thirty years of age at the time of his election? Had he been nine years a citizen of the United States? Was he at the time of his election a citizen of the State for which he shall have been chosen? Was the election held at the time and place directed by the laws of the State? These are facts capable of clear demonstration by proofs, and in the absence of the requisite qualifications in either of the specified cases, or if the existing laws of the State regulating the time and place for holding the election were violated, the Senate, acting under the power to judge of "the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," might adjudge the commission of the person elected void, although in all other respects it was legal and constitutional. But where the sovereign will of the State is made known through its legislature, and consummated by its proper official functionaries in due form, it would be a dangerous exertion of power to look behind the commission for defects in the component parts of the legislature, or into the peculiar organization of the body for reasons to justify the Senate in declaring its acts absolutely null and void. Such a power, if carried to its legitimate extent, would subject the entire scope of State legislation to be overruled by our decision, and even the right of suffrage of individual members of the legislature whose elections were contested might be set aside. It would also lead to investigations into the motives of members in casting their votes, for the purpose of establishing a charge of bribery or corruption in particular cases. These matters, your committee think, properly belong to the tribunals of the State, and cannot constitute the basis on which the Senate could, without an infringement of State sovereignty, claim the right to declare the election of a Senator void who possessed the requisite qualifications and was chosen according to the forms of law and the Constitution.

These general views are offered to show that contested elections in the popular branch of Congress, where the people exert in their primary capacity the right of suffrage under various limitations and restrictions in the choice of Representatives from certain prescribed districts, open a much wider field of inquiry and investigation than a like contest for a seat in the Senate, which is a body wholly federative in its character and organization and whose members hold their appointments from and represent the States as political sovereignties. Your committee having regard to these rules as applicable to all contested elections in the Senate, proceed to apply them to the case now under consideration.

It is admitted that the sitting member, Asher Robbins, possesses all the qualifications required by the Constitution of the United States to be a Senator in Congress, and that his commission as such is in due form according to the laws and usages of Rhode Island. These points being conceded, the remaining and the only question to be decided is, was the body by which he was chosen a Senator the legislature of Rhode Island? or was it merely an assemblage of citizens without authority to pass laws prescribing that which is right and prohibiting that which is wrong to the people of the State? On this ground both parties seem content to rest their claims to a seat in the Senate.

The general assembly of Rhode Island, as at present organized, consists of two separate and distinct branches: The senate, over which body the governor presides, and the house of representatives—each chosen by the people of the State who are freemen or freeholders and entitled to vote at elections. The governor and senate are elected annually; the members of the house of representatives, semi-annually. To constitute a legislature capable of enacting laws or performing any other duty confided to that body by the constitution of the State or of the United States it is essential that there should be in existence at the same time a governor or some officer authorized to perform the executive functions, a senate, and a house of representatives. In the absence of either the other branches could not perform any act which would be obligatory on the people of the State. We are then brought to the inquiry whether these component parts of the legislature of Rhode Island were assembled at Providence in January, 1833, when Mr. Robbins was elected in grand committee a Senator to Congress? It is alleged on the one hand that the governor and senate had ceased to exist in the month of May, 1832, by the expiration of the term of one year for which they had been elected and the failure of the people to elect their successors by a majority of all the votes given in, according to the constitution and laws of the State. On the other, it is maintained that the powers of the governor and senate were by law extended until their successors should be duly chosen and engaged, for which purpose special elections were ordered and held, but without success, prior to the time at which Mr. Robbins was elected. For the purpose of forming a correct judgment of this anomaly in the constitution of the State it is necessary to recur to the ancient charter of Charles II, of England, granted to the colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in 1663, which has not been superseded by a written constitution since the Revolution, and to the various laws which have been enacted modifying the provisions of that charter in such manner as to adapt it to the condition and convenience of the people of the State. By the charter certain political powers, rights, and privileges are granted to the inhabitants of the colony, among which are the following:

"And further, we will and ordain, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do declare and appoint that, for the better ordering and managing of the affairs of the said company and their successors, there shall be one governor, one deputy governor, and ten assistants, to be from time to time constituted, elected, and chosen, out of the freemen of the said company for the time being, in such manner and form as is hereafter in these presents expressed; which said officers shall apply themselves to take care for the best disposing and ordering of the general business and affairs of and concerning the lands and hereditaments hereinafter mentioned to be granted, and the plantation thereof, and the government of the people there."—Charter of R. I., page 6, Digest 1822.

"And that forever hereafter, twice in every year, that is to say, on every first Wednesday in the month of May, and on every last Wednesday in October, or oftener in case it shall be requisite, the assistants, and such of the freemen of the said company, not exceeding six persons for Newport, four persons for each of the respective towns of Providence, Portsmouth, and Warwick, and two persons for each other place, town, or city, who shall be from time to time thereunto elected or deputed by the major part of the freemen of the respective towns or places for which they shall be so elected or deputed, shall have a general meeting or assembly, then and there to consult, advise, and determine in and about the affairs and business of the said company and plantations. And further, we do, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, give and grant, unto the said governor and company of the English colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in New England, in America, and their successors, that the governor, or, in his absence, and by his permission, the deputy governor of the said company for the time being, the assistants, and such of the freemen of the said company as shall be so as aforesaid elected or deputed, or so many of them as shall be present at such meeting or assembly as aforesaid, shall be called the general assembly; and that they, or the greatest part of them then present, whereof the governor or deputy governor and six of the assistants, at least to be seven, shall have, and hereby have, given and granted unto them full power and authority from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to appoint, alter, and change such days, times, and places of meeting and general assembly as they shall think fit, &c." * * *

"And from time to time to make, ordain, constitute, or repeal such laws, statutes, orders, and ordinances, forms and ceremonies of government and magistracy, as to them shall seem meet for the good and welfare of the said company, and for the government and ordering of the lands and hereditaments hereinafter mentioned to be granted, and of the people that do, or at any time hereafter shall, inhabit or be within the same, so as such laws, ordinances, and constitutions so made be not contrary and repugnant unto, but as near as may be agreeable to the laws of this our realm of England, considering the nature and constitution of the place and people there."—Digest of 1822, pages 6, 7, 8 of Charter.

"And further, our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby for us, our heirs and successors, establish and ordain that yearly, once in the year forever hereafter, namely, the aforesaid Wednesday in May, and at the town of Newport, or elsewhere, if urgent occasion do require, the governor, deputy governor, and assistants of the said company, and other officers of the said company, or such of them as the general assembly shall think fit, shall be in the said general court or assembly to be held from that day or time, newly chosen for the year ensuing by such greater part of said company for the time being as shall be then and there present."—Digest of 1822, page 9 of the Charter.

These extracts from the charter will serve to show the original structure of the government of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. The charter provides that the governor, deputy governor, and assistants shall be chosen annually on the first Wednesday of May in each and every year by a majority of the company at Newport. The deputies to the general assembly were to be chosen in the several towns for which they were elected semi-annually, and to assemble on the first Wednesday in May and the last Wednesday in October, or oftener, in case it should be requisite, at such place as might be designated by law. The governor, deputy governor, assistants, and deputies, as organized under the charter, formed one body, which is called the general assembly.

The unlimited power granted to this body to repeal or modify the existing regulations for the government of the colony, or to adopt such new regulations as might be deemed expedient for the convenience of the people, has been exercised from time to time before and since the Revolution, when Rhode Island became one of the States of the Union. These modifications have materially changed the provisions of the charter, and established fundamental principles of government inconsistent with those recognized and ordained by the charter, which now remains only the nominal foundation of the legislation of the State. Your committee think it necessary to present a summary of these interpolations on the charter, as they furnish a practical illustration of the powers claimed and exercised in this respect by the general assembly of Rhode Island, the validity of which does not seem to have been at any time questioned:

1. By the last clause of the charter above cited the election of governor, deputy governor, and assistants is required to be made at Newport on the first Wednesday of May in each year by the whole body of the freemen of the company assembled at that place in person. This is the literal requirement of the charter, and was made, we presume, in conformity to analogous customs in England and Wales in the elections for counties and boroughs. The difficulty of convening the freemen from the different towns of the colony at the season indicated, and the expense and inconvenience attending their assemblage at Newport for an uncertain length of time until an election could be effected, very speedily suggested a modification of this requirement. As early as October 26, 1664, a little more than one year after the reception of the charter, after stating the inconveniences attending a personal voting at Newport, the general assembly ordained that "voting by proxces be enjoyed by all the freemen of this collony, and that each freeman desiering to vote by proxy shall subscribe their names on the outside, and deliver his votts sealed up into the hands of a majestrate in the face of a towne metting lawfully called, and notice given for that porpose * * * which sayd votts shall be by such whome the General Assembly shall appoynt, opened and delivered forth as the respective choice of the several votts shall requier; provided that this order shall noe way prejudice or discorradge any who desier to be personally present."—Ancient Records, page 256.

This palpable departure from the original provisions of the charter continued to be the law of Rhode Island for nearly a century, viz, until August, 1760, when a different arrangement was substituted, but still more manifestly departing from the literal requirements of that instrument.

2. As stated in our remarks immediately following the passages of the charter above cited, the general assembly of the colony was constituted into one body, consisting of a governor, deputy governor, and ten assistants, and so many deputies elected from the freemen of the several towns as are specifically stated in the second of those quotations. This single body was invested with all the powers, legislative and judicial, which the clauses of the charter enumerate, and acted as a single body, determining its acts by a majority of voices for the three successive years subsequent to its creation by charter. In March 27, 1666, at the suggestion of the towns of Portsmouth and Warwick, an act passed the general assembly "concerning deputies sitting apart." After stating the inconveniences of a single assembly, they enact and declare that "it is freely agreed that the request of the towns aforesaid be granted, and ordered that the magestrates" (governor, deputy governor, and assistants) "sitt by themselves, and the deputies by themselves; and that each house soe sitting have equal power and priviledge in the proposing, composing, and propogatting any act, order, and law in generall assembly, and that nether house in generall assembly shall have power, without the concurrance of the majour part of the other house, to make any law or order to be accounted as an acte of the generall assembly."—Ancient Records, page 298.

This law of the assembly of 1666, and not the charter, is the whole basis of the present organization of the legislature of Rhode Island, which consists, as we have before stated, as at present constituted, of two branches—a senate and a house of representatives, each armed with a negative upon the other.

3. The act of August, 1760, is another and remarkable departure from the literal requirements of the charter of King Charles. By the charter itself the whole body of freemen of the colony were to assemble, in person, at Newport, and to elect, by a major vote of the company, the governor, deputy governor, and assistants. The law of October, 1664, relaxed this provision and substituted a mixed system of voting for these officers, partly in person and partly by proxy. This continued to be in force until the session of the general assembly in August, 1760, when a law was passed entitled "An act regulating the general election." In the preamble to this act it is set forth "that it is found, by long experience, the freemen going to Newport to put in their votes for general officers at the elections is very injurious to the interest and public weal of the colony; * * * and that all the ends of voting may be as fully attained by the freemen's putting in their proxy votes at the town meeting in their own towns, appointed by law for that purpose, agreeable to the ancient and laudable custom of most of the prudent freemen: Therefore,

"Be it enacted, That, for the future, every freeman who is disposed to give his suffrage at the election of general officers in this colony shall do it by putting in a proxy vote in the town meeting in the town to which he belongs, on the third Wednesday of April next preceding the general election, agreeable to the law and well-known custom of proxing; and no freeman shall be permitted to vote for general officers at the general election held at Newport, on the first Wednesday in May, but only such as be members of the general assembly."

Thus, by this act of the legislature, the whole system of voting laid down by the charter is radically altered. The assembling of the freemen of the colony at Newport on the first Wednesday in May, as the charter prescribes, is entirely abrogated; the mixed method of voting, partly in person and partly by proxies sent to Newport from the other towns of the colony, is also modified; and the whole system is changed to the law as it now stands, with very slight variations, viz, that the freemen, on the third Wednesday of April in each year, in their several towns, shall proceed to elect a governor, deputy governor, and assistants, and not in one body assembled in Newport, on the first Wednesday in May.

The law of 1760 was deficient in one important particular, which the act of January, 1832 (the particular act now complained of), was intended to remedy. Formerly, and from the reception of the charter until August, 1760, a failure to elect general officers was a contingency not to be apprehended, because the freemen assembled at Newport would continue assembled and voting until a choice were effected. But by the act of August, 1760, the freemen were to vote in separate towns, and the votes thus given having been transmitted to Newport, were counted in the presence of the governor and assistants of the former year, in convention with the deputies then recently elected. If it appeared, on counting, that there was no choice by the major part of the freemen, there was no provision in this act for a second trial for these offices in the separate towns; and the body of the freemen not being assembled in Newport, it was impossible to go on in the ancient method and continue to vote till the choice was consummated. If the requirements of the charter, and the usages under it, had been strictly complied with, the body of the freemen would have appeared at Newport, the governor and assistants of the former year would have presided in the election, and the voting would have gone on until an election were completed. The act of August, 1760, having changed this arrangement in the manner above stated, all that the act of January, 1832, did was to follow out its provisions, and to declare that the governor and assistants of the former year should hold over, while other trials were had in the separate towns, and until an election of general officers was effected by those trials, exactly as they would have held over if the election had been made by the body of the freemen assembled at Newport. But of the character of this act your committee will speak more particularly hereafter.

4. Your committee will barely advert to two other acts of the legislature of Rhode Island which conflict more or less with the provisions of the charter, but whose validity they believe has never been disputed; such as the act devolving the powers and duties of governor on a person who had never been elected by the freemen to that office, in certain cases; also, the act authorizing the governor, in certain events, to appoint times and places of the meeting of the general assembly, although the charter provides that the assembly itself shall appoint such times and places; both these acts being embodied in "the act to provide for the performance of the duties of the governor in certain cases, and also for regulating the sitting of the general assembly."—Digest of 1822, page 99.

One other act of the general assembly deserves notice in this connection, as illustrating in a striking manner the peculiar character of legislation in Rhode Island. The bill of rights, which in all other States emanates from the people in their primary capacity, in this State is incorporated into its code of statutes in the form of an act declaratory of the rights of the people.

The foregoing review of the innovations made from time to time during the existence both of the colonial and State governments of Rhode Island on the provisions of the charter conferring on the people political rights demonstrates the power claimed and exercised by the general assembly to alter or modify, without restraint, the fundamental principles of the form of government transmitted to them by the King of Great Britain. This power has never been denied either in reference to its validity or extent. The right of suffrage has been extended to a class of citizens who did not enjoy it under the charter; the elections directed to be held at Newport on the first Wednesday of May in each year are held throughout the State on such days and at such places as are provided for by law; the manner of holding and conducting elections and of returning the votes is changed; the general assembly is divided into two separate branches, each having a negative on the action of the other, contrary to the charter, by which it is constituted into one body; a bill of rights, which properly belongs to the constitutions of the several States as a part of the fundamental law, has been given to the people of Rhode Island by a simple act of legislation. These, and many other primary principles, are to be found in the code of statute law of that State, while of the ancient charter there seems to be scarcely a vestige remaining untouched, except that clause which prohibits the enactment of any law contrary to the laws of England, and this became obsolete by virtue of the Revolution.

The people of the State have ratified all these changes, not only by their silent acquiescence, but by their positive sanction. The power to make them was necessary to the welfare of the people, and was wisely reserved in the precise words of the charter. Your committee can perceive nothing in the act of January, 1832, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act regulating the manner of admitting freemen, and directing the method of electing officers in this State,'" which assumes a power different in its character from that which had been previously recognized as appertaining to the general assembly. The necessity of proper precautions to prevent an interregnum in the government of the State was seen and duly considered by the legislature. They believed it to be not only possible but highly probable that the people might fail at the regular annual election to choose a governor, lieutenant-governor, and a sufficient number of senators to form a constitutional quorom for the transaction of business. The result proves that this apprehension was well founded. The first section of the act declares that in case there be no choice of a governor at an annual election the house of representatives shall order a new election for the choice of a governor, and that in case no choice should then be made, that the order shall be renewed as often as the votes are returned to the general assembly until a governor be elected, or until such proceedings shall become unnecessary by reason of the provision of law for the next annual election; and in the mean time that the governor of the preceding year shall continue, under his former engagement, to exercise all the powers and perform and execute all the functions or duties of the office of governor until another shall be elected and engaged in his place; and shall receive such proportion of the salary as corresponds with the time he shall so serve. The same provisions are made as to the lieutenant-governor and all the other general officers, in case of a like failure to elect those officers at the annual election. The third section of the act relates to the choice of senators (assistants), and directs that new elections shall be ordered as in the cases above mentioned and with the same limitations, unless six senators, being the requisite number to form a quorum, shall have been chosen at the annual election. The contingencies intended to be provided against by this act actually occurred. No governor nor lieutenant-governor was chosen to succeed those of the past year; the number of senators required for a quorum were not elected by the people; and, in compliance with the provisions of the act, new elections were ordered by the house of representatives where a failure to elect had happened, until in the judgment of that house "such proceedings had become unnecessary by reason of the provision of law for the next annual election."

The general assembly, in the mean time, as at that time constituted, continued to perform all the functions which properly belong to that body until the end of the session at Providence, January, 1833. It remains then to be inquired, was this body so assembled the legislature of Rhode Island? The law by virtue of which they continued to exercise the powers of legislation is said to be repugnant to the charter, and therefore void. If this be a sound objection it at once annuls every part of their proceedings, and as a necessary consequence, that of choosing a Senator in Congress.

Your committee are unable to find any clause in the charter which forbids the exercise of such a power as that claimed by the passage of the act of January, 1832. It seems, on the contrary, to have been the intention of the crown to perpetuate the existence of the legislative power in the colony by an express provision—that the authority, office, and power of the governor, deputy governor, and assistants shall cease and determine when their successors shall be elected and engaged, and not at the expiration of the term for which they were respectively chosen. The construction of this clause of the charter has been uniform from the commencement of the government up to the present time.

The governor, deputy governor, and senators (assistants) of the preceding year, at the opening of each annual session of the legislature in May, take their seats, and join the house of representatives in grand committee and continue to act until their successors are engaged. This is abundantly sufficient to prove that they hold over, as a matter of course for the purpose of organizing the members newly elected to succeed them; and it does not seem to be material whether the time required for the performance of this duty be one or more days; for the same principle under which they hold over for a single day would apply to a longer time if it should be required to complete the organization. But it is not necessary to resort to this provision of the charter, or to the practice under it, to establish the validity of the power to pass the act of January, 1832. The general power given in the charter to the legislature, "from time to time to make, ordain, constitute, or repeal such laws, statutes, orders and ordinances, forms and ceremonies of government and magistracy as to them shall seem meet," without limitation, is broad enough to cover the whole ground assumed in justification of that act. If Rhode Island had followed the example of her sister States of the Union, and adopted a written constitution, it will not be denied that this power to continue in existence the legislative body until their successors should be chosen and engaged might have been given in that instrument. Shall we then deny to her the right to effect the same object by law when the people have, by a long and uninterrupted acquiescence in that mode of fixing the fundamental principles of the government, imparted to such laws the force and efficiency of a constitutional provision emanating from a convention chosen for that special purpose? Your committee hold it to be an undeniable principle, applicable to all forms of government, that there must exist in the supreme legislative power of the State a capacity to preserve itself from annihilation. Waiving, therefore, all the considerations arising out of the charter and the immemorial usage of the State, which might be safely relied upon to justify the act in question, there are other grounds on which the exercise of the power claimed may be sustained and vindicated. The constitutions of the several States are, in the broadest sense, popular, emanating directly from the people, and subject to be modified and amended as the people may think proper. The legislative power embraces every object without distinction which is not expressly prohibited by a declaration of rights or an article of the Constitution. The structure of the State governments differs in this important respect from the Government of the United States, which is restricted in its sphere of action to the delegated powers and such as are necessary and proper to carry them into effect. On this principle, the legislature of Rhode Island, in the absence of a written constitution, could only be restrained in the extent of its powers by some negative provisions of the charter or of the bill of rights subsequently adopted for the better security of the people in the enjoyment of liberty. In neither of these, nor in any other act or instrument now in force, is there to be found any prohibition of the power to continue over an existing legislature until their successors shall be duly chosen and engaged. The act of January, 1832, was deemed to be necessary to preserve the government from dissolution, and to provide for new and extraordinary elections by the people. It has been sanctioned by the people by their action under it, in their primary capacity, and by the constituted authorities of their State in the several departments. All the laws, either of a private or general nature, passed by the legislature at their several sessions from the first Wednesday of May, 1832, to the close of the session, January, 1833, are now in full force and operation. The highest judicial tribunal of the State was composed of judges elected in grand committee of the two houses at the August session, 1832, and their commissions were issued under the great seal of the State and the signature of the governor, who was continued in office by the provisions of the act of January, 1832.

Your committee could not expect to find evidence more satisfactory of the character of the body by which Asher Robbins, the sitting member, was elected a Senator to Congress in January, 1833.

The Constitution of the United States expressly declares that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the legislature thereof." But what is the definition of the term legislature? Both its literal and technical meaning is, "the power that makes laws." It is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and merges all other powers when it does not transcend the limitations contained in the fundamental constitution of the State. When, therefore, we find that during the existence of the general assembly, one branch of which was continued and held their seats by virtue of the law of January, 1832, this legislature passed fourteen laws of a general nature and twenty-eight private acts, many of them acts of incorporation, besides numerous resolutions on various subjects falling within the range of legislative power, a schedule of which is hereunto annexed, marked C; and when these laws and resolutions remain on the statute-book of Rhode Island in full force and effect, sanctioned by judicial decisions, and tacitly submitted to by the people over whom they operate, it would seem to your committee a very dangerous assumption of power in one branch of Congress, or even in every department of the General Government combined, to interfere with the internal regulations of the State, and to denounce the body by which these laws and resolutions were passed as a mere assemblage of citizens without any public authority whatever, and not the legislature of the State. Such a power does not belong to the Federal Government, and would, if claimed and carried out to its full extent, annihilate all the reserved rights of the States. It is a general principle of national law, applicable to all distinct and independent governments, that if there arise any disputes in a State on the fundamental laws and public administration, or on the prerogatives of the different powers of which it is composed, it is the business of the State alone to judge and determine them in conformity to its political constitution. No government has a right to intrude into the domestic affairs of another State and attempt to influence its deliberations or to control its action. This principle is recognized in the Constitution of the United States, by which the respective States united and formed themselves into a federal republic. Conceding, as we feel bound to do, to the State of Rhode Island, in common with all the other States of the Union, the power to decide for itself all questions relating to its domestic policy, there would seem to be no ground on which to rest a doubt that she has decided, in the most solemn manner, the character and powers of the body by which Mr. Robbins was chosen a Senator to Congress. They passed numerous laws which are in full force. They elected judges of the supreme court of the State, who have taken a new engagement or oath of office, and accepted new commissions from the governor; entered on their official duties, and condemned to death a citizen found guilty of a capital offense against the laws of the State. They received compensation out of the treasury of the State for their services, and disbursed the public money necessary for the support of the government. No question has arisen touching or impugning the validity of any one of these acts because they were passed or performed by an incompetent body, with the single exception of the attempt made by a succeeding legislature to vacate the election of Mr. Robbins. Your committee cannot omit to refer to the preamble of the act annulling that election, in which the legislature fully recognize their predecessors as "the general assembly" of the State. The only ground assumed to justify the act declaring the election null and void is comprised in a single sentence of the preamble, in the following words:

"Whereas the general assembly which elected Asher Robbins a Senator to the Senate of the United States on the 19th day of January last did not comply with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act in addition to an act entitled "An act regulating the manner of admitting freemen, and directing the method of electing officers in this State,"' by virtue of which the members of one branch of said assembly then held their offices, but proceeded prematurely therein, and the said election is therefore void, and ought so to be declared by this assembly: Therefore, Be it enacted, &c."

Again, the same legislature at their session held in May, 1833, passed an act to repeal the law of January, 1832, in the ordinary form, but express no opinion that the law so repealed was null and void, and thereby admit its validity up to the date of the repealing act. It is worthy of remark, also, that the same legislature at the session held in October, 1833, passed a special act to carry into effect an act of the legislature passed in January, 1833, changing the mode of electing representatives to Congress, and declaring that a plurality of votes should in future decide the election in certain cases, contrary to the former and long established law of the State, by which a majority of all the votes polled at any such election was necessary to a choice in all cases. Thus the power of the legislature assembled in January, 1833, to enact this important law is fully acknowledged and conceded by their successors, while their power to elect a Senator to Congress is denied and declared null and void. Your committee advert to these acts as conclusive in reference to the character of the body of men which elected Mr. Robbins. If they were competent to bind the people of the State by general laws, which is nowhere contested, they could only exercise such a power in their capacity as the legislature of the State, and as such it was their constitutional right and incumbent duty to choose a Senator to Congress. There was but one governor and but one senate in the State claiming to be a part of the general assembly. If there had existed another body of men, however chosen, contending for the offices of the governor and senators in the State, it will not be denied that their respective rights might be the subject of inquiry in deciding a contested election in the Senate of the United States. But in the absence of any such conflicting claims to these offices when only one legislative body was known in the State which exercised all the power and performed all the functions of the legislature, and whose acts have in every form and by every department of the government been declared valid, it would seem to be a palpable invasion of the sovereignty of the State to abrogate its laws and overthrow its government by denying that a body capable of exercising the powers of legislation existed in the State after the term for which a governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators chosen at the annual election in April, 1831, had expired. To annul the election of Mr. Robbins would involve all these absurdities, and must be productive of confusion and anarchy in the State of which he has been chosen a Senator in Congress.

The time at which the election took place and the manner in which it was conducted were in strict conformity to the laws of Rhode Island. The two houses met in grand committee according to law at the session of the general assembly next preceding the expiration of the term of service of Asher Robbins, then a Senator in Congress, and elected him for another term of six years, to commence on the 3d day of March, 1833, and then the grand committee assembled for this purpose was dissolved. The choice was made by the legislature of the State, whose laws are held to be valid and binding throughout the State; they command and receive obedience from the people. No objection is made or can be made either to the time or manner of the election. The Senator elected has all the requisite qualifications demanded by the Constitution, and his commission or credentials were in due form delivered to him and presented to the Senate. Your committee hold this to be a vested right, the obligation and effect of which no subsequent legislature of that State could impair; still less had they authority to proceed to the election of another Senator until the seat of the Senator-elect had been vacated by a solemn decision of the Senate of the United States. With these views of the subject referred to them, your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Asher Robbins, being duly and constitutionally chosen a Senator in Congress from the State of Rhode Island, is entitled to his seat in the Senate.

A.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, &c.,
Saturday, January 19, 1833.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

APRIL 4, 1834.—Read, and ordered to be printed.

The minority of the select committee on the contested seat occupied by the Hon. Asher Robbins report:

The undersigned, a member of the select committee of the Senate to which was referred the subject of a contested seat in the Senate from the State of Rhode Island, the Hon. Asher Robbins being the sitting member and the Hon. Elisha R. Potter claiming the seat occupied by the said Robbins, entertaining opinions and views different from those expressed by the majority of the said committee in their report submitted to the Senate on the 4th day of March instant, respectfully submits the following report:

The course adopted by the committee to settle the facts upon which their opinions were to be formed was to call upon the parties to the controversy for statements of the facts which they wished to prove, or which each wished admitted by his opponent, as being, in their estimation, material to their respective claims. This call was answered by Mr. Potter by the statement signed by him, and dated 11th December last, which is hereto annexed, marked D. Mr. Robbins replied to this statement of Mr. Potter by the paper hereto annexed, marked E. This reply of Mr. Robbins was submitted to Mr. Potter, and drew from him the additional statement signed by him, and dated 31st December last, which is hereto annexed, marked F. Here the statements of fact closed, and Mr. Potter was called upon for such arguments as he might choose to submit to the committee, when he returned the paper annexed, signed by him, dated 21st January last, and hereto annexed, marked G. To this argument Mr. Robbins replied by the paper signed by him, dated 24th January last, and hereto annexed, marked H. Mr. Potter rejoined by the paper signed by him, dated 3d February last, and hereto annexed, marked I. In this state the case was submitted to the committee, each party having accompanied their statements with such proofs from the journals of the legislature of their State and other public records as they considered required. Most of the points established by the proofs submitted are fully admitted and agreed upon by the parties in their statements of fact, and therefore such of them only will be referred to and annexed as may be found material to establish facts not so admitted. The statements and arguments of the parties are annexed, because the undersigned considers the question one of the highest importance, and that it is proper the Senate should see fully the facts which the immediate parties to the controversy have considered in any way material, the arguments by which they have sought to direct the judgments of the members of the committee, and the conclusions they have formed upon the points raised.

The majority of the committee, in the view they have taken of the subject, have not considered it important to print these statements, or but a very small portion of the proofs submitted, but as the course of reflection pursued by the undersigned and the opinion he has formed has been governed by the facts disclosed in these papers, and as the parties have so intermixed fact and argument in all their statements that the one cannot well be separated from the other, he feels that he may not be borne out in his facts without annexing to this report these statements entire, while he is sensible that the arguments he shall offer will be mostly repetitions of those which the parties have presented to him. That both of the parties have assumed positions which are untenable, as well as positions which are wholly irrelevant, is clear to his mind, as he does not doubt it will be to the judgment of the Senate; but he still thinks they have not omitted the true and material points of the controversy, and that their suggestions may do that justice to the subject which it will not receive from any effort of his. The undersigned believes that as to most of the facts assumed by the majority of the committee there will be no dispute; but as there are facts in the case which he considers material, and to which the majority of the committee do not refer in their report, a reference to the statements of the parties and to some of the proofs will be necessary to authorize him to use those facts to sustain his conclusions. And if, under this impression, he should connect with this report any portion of the documents before the committee, which upon examination may not appear to have been necessarily so connected, he feels sure that the Senate will find his excuse in the conviction he is under that the novelty and importance of the question demands a full exhibition of the facts and arguments which are material and relevant, and that the safe course is to withhold nothing which may be important, though that course may lead to the examination of much which is unimportant.

Having reference to these statements, and to such other documents as shall be hereafter referred to, the undersigned makes the following relation of facts upon which he supposes the decision of the question submitted to the committee must mainly rest.

Charles II, King of England, in the year 1663, granted to his colony in America known as the colony of Rhode Island and the Providence Plantations (now the State of Rhode Island) a charter for its civil government, which was submitted to the people of the colony and adopted by them, and thus became the fundamental law of the colonial government. (See the paper annexed, duly certified, and marked K.)

The said charter provided, among other things, that "for the better ordering and managing of the affairs and business of the said company and their successors there shall be one governor, one deputy governor, and ten assistants, to be from time to time constituted, elected, and chosen, out of the freemen of the said company for the time being, in such manner and form as is hereafter in these presents expressed." (See the Charter, page 6 of the Laws of Rhode Island, Digest of 1822.)

The charter appointed the first governor, deputy governor, and assistants "to continue in the said several offices, respectively, until the first Wednesday which shall be in the month of May now next coming. (See same page as above.)

The charter further provided "that for ever hereafter, twice in every year, that is to say, on every first Wednesday in the month of May and on every last Wednesday in October, or oftener in case it shall be requisite, the assistants and such of the freemen of the said company, not exceeding six persons for Newport, four persons for each of the respective towns of Providence, Portsmouth, and Warwick, and two persons for each other place, town, or city, who shall be, from time to time, thereunto elected or deputed by the major part of the freemen of the respective towns or places for which they shall be so elected or deputed, shall have a general meeting or assembly, then and there to consult, advise, and determine in and about the affairs and business of the said company and plantations." (See Charter, page 7, Digest of 1822.)

The charter further provided "that the governor, or, in his absence, or by his permission, the deputy governor of the said company for the time being, the assistants, and such of the freemen of the said company as shall be so as aforesaid elected or deputed, or so many of them as shall be present at such meeting or assembly as aforesaid, shall be called the general assembly, and that they, or the greatest part of them then present, whereof the governor or deputy governor and six of the assistants, at least to be seven, shall have, and have hereby, given and granted unto them full power and authority," &c.; thus constituting the legislative body for the colony. (See Charter, same page as last above.)

The charter further provided for the election, time of election, and term of office of the governor, deputy governor, and assistants, in the following words, to wit: "And further, our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby, for us, our heirs and successors, establish and ordain, that yearly, once in the year, for ever hereafter, namely, the aforesaid Wednesday in May, and at the town of Newport, or elsewhere if urgent occasion do require, the governor, deputy governor, and assistants of the said company, and other officers of the said company, or such of them as the general assembly shall think fit, shall be, in the said general court or assembly to be held from that day and time newly chosen for the year ensuing by such greater part of the said company, for the time being, as shall be then and there present." (See Charter, page 9, Digest of 1822.)

No charter was granted to this colony by the crown of Great Britain subsequent to that of Charles II above mentioned and previous to the American Revolution, but the colony remained subject to the provisions of that charter so long as it remained a British colony; and the people of the State of Rhode Island, since the Revolution, have formed no constitution of government, but have continued the system of government existing with them at the time of that event, having only changed their allegiance.

From the time of the adoption of the charter in 1663–'64 by the people of the colony up to the year 1831 no change had taken place in the qualifications for the offices of governor, deputy governor, or assistants, or in the terms of their respective offices, but all those officers were elected annually during all that period. The official name of the deputy governor had been changed in the laws to that of lieutenant-governor, the official name of assistants to that of senators, and the official name of the deputies to that of representatives; but these changes of official names or designations were not accompanied by any changes of official powers or duties.

The charter contemplated that all the freemen should assemble at Newport, "or elsewhere if urgent occasion do require," and should vote at the same poll for their governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators. This mode of voting was partially changed soon after the granting of the charter, and a privilege was given to each freeman to attend at Newport and vote in person, or to send his vote by a proxy. The increase of population in the colony and its diffusion over a large extent of territory in the course of time induced the legislature to extend this system of voting by proxy, and to provide for the holding of a poll in each town on the day of an annual election, giving to the freemen of the towns the right to prepare a written or printed ballot containing the names of the persons for whom each should choose to vote for governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, and all such other general officers as were to be voted for, or as the voter should choose to vote for, with proper designations as to the office designed for each person voted for; which ballot, so prepared, with the full name of the voter written upon the back thereof, he was at liberty to deposit in the ballot-box of his town. Accurate poll-lists of the persons voting were to be kept, and after the close of the poll the ballots so deposited in the box and the indorsement of the name of the voter on the back thereof were to be compared with the poll-list, and when found to agree the original poll-list was to be deposited with the town clerk of the town for the inspection of the freemen thereof, and a copy of the same poll-list, together with the ballots so taken, carefully sealed up by the persons having charge of the poll, was to be delivered to the member of the house of representatives elected for the town, or to a senator, to be by him taken to Newport, and there delivered in the general assembly on the day fixed by the charter for the election at Newport of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, and other general officers. On that day the house of representatives newly elected for the half year then next following take the oath of office, and then proceed to open and count these votes so sent to them for the choice of a governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, and such other general officers as are to be elected, to compare the votes with the poll-lists also sent and to pronounce the result; and the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators elected, if any such officers are elected by a majority of all the votes thus given, the result being pronounced, take the oath of office, and the legislature is organized. This system of voting was substantially adopted by the colony as early as the year 1760, and has ever since been and still is the manner in which the freemen of Rhode Island vote for their governor, lieutenant-governor, senators, and other general officers. (See the statements of the parties annexed, and particularly the act of August, 1760, marked L.)

The charter seems also to have contemplated that the whole legislature should have formed one body or aggregate mass; but soon after the granting of the charter the practice was adopted of forming one house of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and assistants, or senators, called the senate, and another house of the representatives elected by the towns, called the house of representatives, and for the purposes of legislation of having the two houses set apart and act separately, each exercising equal legislative powers, and of consequence each having a negative upon the action of the other. This practice is still continued in the organization of the legislature of Rhode Island for legislative purposes, though when acting executively, or acting in the election of a Senator to represent the State in the Senate of the United States, the two houses still act together as one body, and in that State are termed by the laws and practice of the Government "The Grand Committee." (See Laws of the State and Journals of the Legislature.)

The time fixed by the charter for the annual elections of governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators is the first Wednesday in May; and to give time for the freemen to hold the polls in their respective towns, and to have their proxies delivered at Newport by the day required, the law prescribes the third Wednesday in April, in each year, for holding the town meetings, and for receiving and sealing up the proxies in the manner before related. (See page 94 of the Digest of 1822.)

Pursuant to these regulations an annual election for governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators was held in the State of Rhode Island on the third Wednesday of April, 1831; and upon counting the proxies returned to Newport on the first Wednesday in May thereafter, the day fixed by the charter, there appeared to have been a governor, lieutenant-governor, and eight of the ten senators duly elected. These, constituting more than a quorum of the senate, were duly sworn, and, together with the house of representatives, composed the legislature of the State; but no attempt was made to fill the two vacancies in the senate.

No question has been made before the committee, or is understood to exist, as to the proper organization of this legislature, or as to its powers as the legislature of the State—the senate for one year from the first Wednesday in May, 1831, and the house of representatives from the same first Wednesday in May until the last Wednesday in October of the same year.

A new house of representatives was duly elected, and qualified on the last Wednesday in October, 1831, which, together with the senate before mentioned, again constituted a regularly organized legislature of the State, with all the powers possessed by any legislature of Rhode Island.

This legislature, in January, 1832, being regularly convened for the transaction of business, passed an act providing, among other things, that, in case of a failure, at any annual election by the people, of the election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, or a quorum of the senate, such of those officers as had been elected previously, and who should then be the incumbents of the offices, and in whose places no others should be elected, should continue in the respective offices, and to possess the powers and discharge the duties thereof until others should be elected and duly qualified to take their places. (See a copy of this act annexed, marked M.)

The annual election pursuant to the law, for the election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators was again held in the towns on the third Wednesday in April, 1832, and the proxies of the freemen of the State taken and sealed up in the usual form; and on the first Wednesday in May thereafter those proxies were opened and counted at Newport; when it was found that no election of governor, lieutenant-governor, or any senator had been made, no person having received the majority of all the votes given for any one of those offices. (See the statement of the parties annexed.)

The governor, lieutenant-governor, and eight senators elected in 1831, and whose official terms, according to all previous practice of the government, expired on that day, continued to act as the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State until the first Wednesday in May, 1833, just two years from the time of their last election and qualification for their respective offices, there having been, in the mean time, between the first Wednesday in May, 1832, and the first Wednesday in May, 1833, five several elections for the choice of persons to fill these offices, the first four of which were special, and held in obedience to a provision contained in the act of January, 1832, before referred to and hereto annexed, and were all unsuccessful; and the fifth was the regular annual election for 1833, held on the third Wednesday in April in that year, in obedience to the general election law of the State, when an election was made of a governor, lieutenant-governor, and eight senators, who took the oaths of office and entered upon the duties on the first Wednesday in May, 1833. (See the statements of the parties annexed.)

During the whole of this period, from the first Wednesday in May, 1832, to the first Wednesday in May, 1833, the house of representatives of the legislature of the State of Rhode Island was in regular organization, and composed of members regularly elected at the ordinary times and in the ordinary manner of electing members to that branch of the legislature of the State, according to the established laws. (See the statements of the parties annexed.)

On the first Wednesday in May, 1832, the Hon. Asher Robbins was a Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Rhode Island, and his official term was to expire on the 3d day of March, 1833; and, by a law of the State, its Senators in the Congress of the United States are to "be appointed at the session of the general assembly next preceding the expiration of the term of service of the Senator for the time being, and not before." (See Digest of 1822, page 107, section 6.)

In January, 1833, the body claiming to be the senate of the State of Rhode Island, and acting as such, consisting of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and eight senators, elected on the third Wednesday in April, 1831, and who took their oaths of office and entered upon their official duties on the first Wednesday of May, 1831, and the house of representatives of the State, regularly elected and qualified, being assembled, and acting as the legislature of the State, met in grand committee, and voted for a Senator to represent the State of Rhode Island in the Senate of the Congress of the United States for the term of six years from the 4th day of March then next following, when the term of Mr. Robbins would have expired. Upon counting the votes so given by the persons assuming to be the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State, and by the members of the house of representatives of the State present and voting, it was found that Asher Robbins had received a majority of the whole number of votes given; whereupon he was declared to be elected. (See the statements of the parties annexed.)

Pursuant to this proceeding, the person then assuming to be the governor of the State of Rhode Island, and acting as such, did, on the 28th day of January then instant, under his hand and the seal of the State, execute and deliver to Mr. Robbins a commission in the ordinary form, according to the laws and practice of the government of the State, for the office of Senator to represent the State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, to commence on the 4th day of March thereafter.

The validity of this election of Mr. Robbins to this office is contested upon the ground that the persons acting as the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State, and, as such, voting for a Senator at the time Mr. Robbins's election was made, were elected on the first Wednesday in May, 1831, "for the year ensuing," and for no longer term; that, upon counting the proxies, and pronouncing the result of the election for governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, on the first Wednesday in May, 1832, these officers became functus officii, so far as related to their election in 1831, whatever that result might be; and that the legislature of the State had not the power to continue their official terms, or official existence, beyond the limits fixed in the charter, of "the year ensuing" their election by the people; and the act of January, 1832, so far as it attempts to perpetuate these officers, without a re-election by the freemen of the State, is pronounced to be contrary to the provisions of the charter, and therefore void.

Upon the other side, it is contended, first, that by the charter itself the offices, powers, and duties of these officers do not cease and determine until others are elected in their places; and, second, that the legislature of Rhode Island have, with the acquiescence of the people of that State, passed many laws in contravention of the charter; that the practice of the government, as shown by its legislation, proves that the charter has not been held to be the fundamental law of the State, except as to certain specific grants; and that the act of January, 1832, does not conflict with those grants, and is therefore a valid act in all its parts.

In view of this part of the controversy, the discussion of the following questions appears to be called for:

First. Is the charter before mentioned, granted by Charles II of England to the colony of Rhode Island and the Providence Plantations, to be now considered to any, and, if to any, to what extent as the constitution of government of the State of Rhode Island, and as a constitution binding upon the legislature of that State?

Second. Does that charter fix and prescribe the term of office of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of that State?

Third. Can the legislature of that State, consistently with the powers granted to that body by the charter, extend the official terms of those officers beyond the limit fixed by the charter?

Fourth. Can the Senate of the United States, when these questions are presented to it by the action of the legislature of the State of Rhode Island, in the purported election of a member for this body, look into, and pronounce its opinion upon them, by way of inquiry into the rights of a sitting member to the seat he occupies?

That the charter of 1663 is, to some extent, to be considered as the fundamental law of the State of Rhode Island, and, as such, binding upon, and restrictive of, the legislative power of that State, is admitted by all, and has not been made a question before the committee. The extent to which it is to be so considered is a point upon which not only the parties before the committee, but the members of the committee themselves, disagree. This point, therefore, must be settled by such references to the history of the legislation and practices of the government and people of the State as have been laid before the committee, and by the inferences which that history shall be found to justify. The undersigned will, in the first instance, offer to the Senate some of the evidences which have operated most strongly upon his mind to show the tenacity with which the people, the government, and the legislature of that State have adhered to the charter in its inconvenient and unjust requirements; going most clearly, in his judgment, to show the strong, binding force which has been allowed to it up to this very day; and, having done this, he will review, as concisely as the importance of the subject will allow, the instances cited by the majority of the committee to show that the legislature have not regarded the charter as binding upon, or restrictive of, their powers when the public interests or the public convenience conflicted with its provisions.

First. The charter fixes the standard of representation for the towns of the State in the popular branch of the legislature by giving to the town of Newport six representatives, to the towns of Providence, Portsmouth, and Warwick four representatives each; and to each other "place, town, or city" in the State, two representatives, wholly without regard to population, property, or any other basis upon which representation is usually settled. By the census taken in 1830, in obedience to an act of Congress, the town of Newport, with six representatives, had a population of 8,010 souls, while the town of Providence, with four representatives, had a population of 16,833 souls; thus showing Providence with more than double the population of Newport, and with but two-thirds of its representation in the popular branch of the legislature. The town of Portsmouth has a population of 1,127 souls, a little more than one-sixteenth of the population of Providence, and a representation exactly equal to it. The town of Smithfield has a populatian of 6,857 souls, and two representatives, and the town of Jamestown has a population of 415 souls, and two representatives—equal to the representation of Smithfield. The whole county of Newport has a population of 16,535 souls, and twenty representatives, while the single town of Providence, with but four representatives, has a population of 16,833 souls. These are some of the instances of the greatest disparity, but the statement annexed, marked N, will show the names and population and representation of all the towns in the State, and, in a condensed form, the population and representation of each county in the State. Still, the legislature of Rhode Island have never attempted to equalize the representation of the State, because the charter has been held to be the fundamental law upon the subject, and to restrain its powers in this particular.

Second. Elections of members to the popular branch of the legislature of the State have continued to be made semi-annually, because such was the requirement of the charter; and to comply with this provision of that instrument, and with the custom of the government under it, the legislature is regularly convened four times in each year. Still no attempt has been made by the legislature, though the State is small and the business of legislation for it not extensive, to alter the forms of the government in this respect. The charter has been held to be paramount to its authority, and to control its action, and the action of the people of the State, in this particular.

Third. A majority of all the votes given at any election by the people has been held to be required to elect any officer of the State government, because the charter requires such majority to constitute an election; and notwithstanding that the present controversy has grown wholly out of that requirement, the legislature of the State has never assumed that it had the power to dispense with the rule, and to authorize the election of those officers by a less number of votes than a majority of all the votes given for the office to be filled. Here again the charter has been, and still is, to be held fundamental law.

Fourth. From the granting of the charter in 1663 to the present time, with the single exception now in dispute, the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State have been elected annually, and have entered upon the duties of their respective offices on the first Wednesday in May in each year, the time prescribed by the charter; have held their offices and discharged the duties thereof for one year, and no longer, without a re-election. In repeated instances vacancies have existed in the Senate in consequence of a failure to elect, by a majority of all the votes given, persons to fill all the places in that body; and those places have, without an exception, until the first Wednesday in May, 1832, remained vacant for the year; nor was the idea ever suggested that the incumbents of the former year could continue to hold them, or that they could be otherwise filled than by an election by the freemen of the State. Until the act of January, 1832, the charter had ever been considered the fundamental law of the State upon this subject, and paramount to any authority existing in the legislature.

Fifth. The mode of conducting elections of the general officers of the State, and the plan of voting by proxy, before detailed, is considered by the undersigned as an evidence of the strongest character to prove the rigidity with which the people and the legislature of Rhode Island have adhered to the charter to the utmost extent of the spirit of even its minute provisions. The charter was granted when the colony was small, and the extent of territory inhabited was very limited. Indeed, it is fair to presume that Newport, Providence, Portsmouth, and Warwick were all the towns then containing a population of freemen, as those are the only towns named in the distribution of the representation of the colony. The population of the colony, too, must have been very small, and therefore the charter was framed under the contemplation that the annual elections could be conveniently held at one point, and that all the freemen could conveniently assemble and vote at the same poll. The practice of a very few years exhibited the inconvenience of this arrangement, and a law was passed presenting to the choice of every voter the alternative of attending the poll at Newport in person or of sending his written vote in the form and manner prescribed by the law. This mode of voting was continued without material alteration for nearly a century, and until the year 1760. Then the system was introduced of holding a poll in each town and of requiring the freemen to deposit their proxies there for the general officers, that being, for all purposes material to this argument, the same system which now prevails, and which has prevailed from the year 1760 to the present time. It is true that the votes are deposited in a ballot-box in each town, but it is also true that every vote is indorsed by the full name of the freeman who gives it, written upon the back of the ballot; that all the ballots, together with accurate poll-lists of the persons voting, are carefully sealed up at the closing of these polls; that they are in that state put into the hands of a member of the legislature, whose duty it is to deliver them, unopened, in the general assembly at Newport, at the time and place when and where, by the charter, the election of the officers voted for is required to be made; that the votes are there opened and counted, and the result ascertained and pronounced in all respects in strict conformity with the requirements of the charter, except that each freeman, instead of attending in person, has sent his written ballot indorsed with his full name, and expressing his free choice. This, in the common parlance of the people of the State, is the election; and the undersigned cannot but consider it a rigid regard to, and strict fulfillment of, the provisions of the charter in their spirit and beneficial meaning, furnishing the highest evidence of the great extent to which the people and the legislature of that State have observed that instrument as their fundamental law and constitution of government.

Sixth. At the January session of the legislature of Rhode Island, in the year 1824, a law was passed to provide for calling a convention to form a constitution of government for the State. The members of the convention were chosen at the annual election on the third Wednesday of April in that year, and assembled at Newport in June following, and entered upon the discharge of the duties assigned to them. They formed a constitution, which was submitted to the people of the State for their adoption or rejection at town meetings holden on the second Monday of October, 1824. The constitution so formed differed widely, in many respects, from the provisions of the charter, and it was rejected by the people of the State by a vote of only 1,668 for to 3,206 against it, thus commanding the approbation of but a trifle more than one-third of the persons voting. It is, from the nature of the case, impossible to say upon what particular grounds this strong rejection was made; but it cannot be improper to remark that the constitution so rejected contained, among other provisions varying from those of the charter, the following:

"The supreme executive power of this State shall be vested in a governor, who shall be chosen by the electors properly qualified, and shall hold his office for the term of one year from the first Tuesday in May next succeeding his election, and until his successor be duly qualified. But if no person shall have a majority of votes, the senate and house of representatives, in joint committee, shall choose a governor, by ballot, from the two persons having the highest number of votes."

Here is a departure from the provisions of the charter in two important particulars: First, that the governor in office shall continue to hold "until his successor be duly qualified;" and, second, that in case of a failure by the people to elect by a majority of all the votes given, the legislature might fill the vacancy. It is freely conceded that the extent to which this provision influenced the decision of the people can never be known, and must ever remain mere matter of opinion; but it is believed that the decisive rejection of this constitution may be properly assumed as a strong evidence of their unyielding attachment to the charter with all its imperfections; and that it would be doing great violence and injustice to the patriotism and intelligence of the people of Rhode Island to suppose that this action on their part took place while they believed that they were without a written constitution of government and wholly dependent for their fundamental law upon the will and pleasure of their legislative bodies.

Seventh. The result of the election in the State of Rhode Island in 1833, after one year of experience under the act of January, 1832, the repeal of that law by the new legislature as one of its first acts; the election again of a new house of representatives in August, 1833; the passage of the act declaring Mr. Robbins's appointment void, in October, 1833, and the appointment of Mr. Potter to represent the State in the Senate of the United States are considered strong evidences that the act of January, 1832, was held by the people of the State to be a violation of the charter, an usurpation of power on the part of the legislature which passed it, and calculated to retain in office men whom they had not elected and did not approve.

Such are the evidences offered to show that the charter has been and is considered by the legislature, the government, and the people of Rhode Island as their fundamental law and constitution of government, to some extent not only, but to the full extent of all its material provisions, except so far as those provisions have been rendered obsolete by the American Revolution and the consequent change of that people from the condition of colonists to that of citizens of a free State.

The majority of the committee entertain a different view upon this subject from that here expressed, and the importance of the question, as well as a proper respect for the opinions of his colleagues upon the committee who differ with him, make it the duty of the undersigned to notice the grounds upon which they rest the conclusion to which they have come. The majority of the committee seem to consider that the power conferred by the charter upon the legislature of the colony "from time to time to make, ordain, constitute, or repeal such laws, statutes, orders, and ordinances, forms, and ceremonies of government and magistracy as to them shall seem meet for the good and welfare of the said company, and for the government and ordering of the lands and hereditaments hereinafter mentioned to be granted, and of the people that do, or at any time hereafter shall, inhabit or be within the same, so as such laws, ordinances, and constitutions, so made, be not contrary and repugnant unto, but, as near as may be, agreeable to the laws of this our realm of England, considering the nature and constitution of the place and people there," grants a power to that body to make laws at variance from, and in contravention of, the provisions of the charter, if such laws "to them shall seem meet for the good and welfare of the said company." This power, they say, "has been exercised from time to time before and since the Revolution, when Rhode Island became one of the States of the Union. These modifications have materially changed the provisions of the charter, and established fundamental principles of government inconsistent with those recognized and ordained by the charter, which now remains only the nominal foundation of the legislation of the State."

The undersigned is unable to assent to the construction which the majority of the committee seem thus to have put upon the clause of the charter above given. He supposes it to be an invariable rule for the construction of every deed or other instrument, and of every law or ordinance, that each part shall be so construed as to make it, to the greatest possible extent, harmonize with, and not be destructive of, any other part or portion of the same deed, instrument, law, or ordinance. The charter of Charles II to the colony of Rhode Island was designed as a system of civil government for the colony; it was a grant from the sovereign to a portion of his subjects for that purpose; it constituted certain offices, and prescribed the powers and the duties in a general manner which should pertain to them. These offices, it will be seen by an examination of the charter, were to constitute the legislature of the colony, and the officers who should fill them were to be the legislators of the colony. To this legislature very broad powers are granted by the charter, and the clause now under consideration is one among the clauses enumerating those powers. Other clauses give other powers, such as to elect and constitute "offices and officers," to grant commissions, "to appoint, order, and direct, erect and settle such places and courts of jurisdiction for the hearing and determining of all actions, cases, matters, and things happening within the said colony and plantation, and which shall be in dispute and depending there;" "to distinguish and set forth the several names and titles, duties, powers, and limits, of each court, office, and officer, superior and inferior;" to contrive and appoint forms of oaths and attestations; "to regulate and order the way and manner of all elections to offices and places of trust;" to limit and distinguish the numbers and bounds of all places, towns, and cities, which may have "the power of electing and sending of freemen to the general assembly;" to direct and authorize the imposing of fines, mulcts, imprisonments, and executing other punishments, pecuniary and corporeal; "to alter, revoke, annul, or pardon, under their common seal, or otherwise, such fines, mulcts, imprisonments, sentences, judgments, and condemnations," with many other powers. Now it is respectfully suggested and urged that the power "to make, ordain, constitute, or repeal such laws, statutes, orders, and ordinances, forms and ceremonies of government and magistracy, as to them shall seem meet," granted to the legislature of the colony by the clause of the charter under consideration, should be understood as applicable to the powers and duties above enumerated, and to all the other powers and duties granted and assigned by the charter to the legislature, and not as conferring powers above and beyond the charter which makes the grant. This construction will make the clause in question act in aid of the charter and of the objects designed to be accomplished by it, while the other construction will make all the remaining portions of the charter entirely contingent and wholly dependent upon what shall "seem meet" to the legislature. It will also present the singular anomaly of a legislative body standing upon the charter as a constitution of government from which it derives its existence, its constitution, its organization and being as a legislative body, and claiming a power, granted in that charter itself, to subvert the whole instrument. Such a construction will not surely be given to this instrument when a different and at least equally natural one presents itself, which will not make the instrument a felo de se, but will make each part harmonize with the whole, and further the purposes which the whole was intended to accomplish.

But the undersigned respectfully suggests his belief that the majority of the committee are mistaken in the extent to which they seem to suppose the acts of the legislature of Rhode Island have conflicted with the provisions of the charter. And that he may make his views upon this point intelligible to the Senate, he will notice, as briefly as he is able, the instances, in their order, wherein the majority think the infractions upon the charter consist.

The first is the permission granted by the legislature of the colony to the freemen of the colony as early as 1664, one year after the granting of the charter, to send to Newport a sealed ballot, expressing the choice of each freeman sending it, for the general officers of the colony, instead of compelling each freeman to attend at Newport in person to express that choice; the ballot so sent being required to be sealed up, and to have the full name of the voter written upon its back, to make it a legal ballot. As the undersigned has already expressed his conviction that this law was not a violation of the charter, but a full compliance with it in its spirit and meaning, no further remarks will be required here, the same point being again raised under the third enumeration by the majority of the committee of the infringements by the legislature upon the provisions of the charter.

The second is the separation of the legislative body of the colony into two houses, each exercising equal legislative powers, and each possessing a negative upon the other, when acting legislatively. This separation took place in the year 1666, about three years after the granting of the charter. It was undoubtedly the contemplation of the charter, as the undersigned construes its language, that the governor, lieutenant-governor, assistants, and deputies should sit together in one body, but it is not seen that the separation by which the governor, lieutenant-governor, and assistants should form one body (now the senate), and the deputies should form another body (now the house of representatives) necessarily constituted any violation of the charter in its spirit and meaning. The members were all to be elected by the people, and at the periods required by the charter, notwithstanding the separation. The same persons were to constitute the legislature of the colony, whether acting together as one body, or separately as two branches of the same legislature. The only effect, therefore, of the separation would be to restrict the legislative power by giving the body, small in numbers, a negative, in all cases as to legislative acts, upon the more numerous body or house. This could not form a subject of complaint on the part of the crown which was one party to the charter, because the effect was to limit the exercise of that portion of sovereignty which had been granted to the colony, and not to extend it. It might have formed the subject of complaint to the people, in case it had operated as such an embarrassment upon the legislative power as to injure the public interests; but when we find that the measure was taken upon the suggestion of two of the most populous towns of the colony, and predicated upon the inconveniences of a single assembly for legislative purposes; that it was adopted after three years only of practice under the contemplation of the charter of a single house; and that it has, from that time to the present, received the acquiescence and approbation of the people, the undersigned respectfully submits that this change may be well considered one of those "forms and ceremonies of government and magistracy" which, to the legislature, might well "seem meet," and which that body might well consider within its powers under the charter "for the good and welfare of the said company," and not as the exercise of a power either above or beyond the specific grants made by the charter.

The third is the law of 1760, requiring polls to be held in the different towns and all the freemen to vote by proxy, and to deposit their proxies, indorsed in writing with their full proper names, in the ballot-boxes at those polls. This law, in all material particulars, established the system of voting which prevails to this day in the State of Rhode Island, and the question is, does this system constitute a violation of the charter of such a character as to authorize the assumption that the people of that State have ceased to consider it the fundamental law of their State government? The undersigned is compelled to say that he does not so consider it; and his reasons for this conclusion are:

1st. That the violation complained of relates solely to a privilege granted to the freemen of the colony by the charter, the exercise of which, either in person or by proxy, must concern them alone, and could not afford to the crown any cause of complaint, whatever might have been the mode of its exercise, so long as that mode only proposed to effect an election by the choice of the freemen of the colony of the officers directed by the charter, and at the times and for the terms fixed by the charter.

2d. That a continuance of the mode of election contemplated by the charter, of assembling all the freemen at the same place on the same day, and having them all then vote at the same poll, had, from the increase and extension of the population of the colony, become impossible in practice.

3d. That the change of form was avowedly adopted "for the good and welfare of the said company," and to the legislature did "seem meet," because the expression of the choice of the freeman made by his written ballot, designating the name of each person for whom he chose to vote, and the office which he designed each person voted for by him should fill, identified by the indorsement of his full proper name upon the back thereof, and sent to Newport under seal, was securing to that freeman as perfect an exercise of his privilege of voting as if he had gone to Newport to deposit that same ballot there.

4th. That for these causes the legislature well considered this change one of those "forms and ceremonies of government and magistracy" that they might "make, ordain, constitute, or repeal, for the good and welfare of the said company," without any violation of the spirit and meaning of the charter.

5th. That the only possible cause of complaint which could grow out of this change in the form of voting was the failure, upon the ballot, to make a choice of the officers to be voted for by a majority of all the votes given for each office, and that such failure was only an event, when it should happen, to operate to the inconvenience of those freemen for whose convenience the system of voting by proxy was adopted.

6th. That the system of voting adopted by the act of 1760, and, in all substantial particulars, yet maintained, is the least departure from the literal and technical requirements of the charter which could be devised if the personal attendance of the freemen of the whole State at Newport on the same day, to vote at the same poll, is to be dispensed with; and therefore goes far to exhibit a determination on the part of the legislature and the people to conform to the strict language of the charter so far as that can be done in the present state of the territory and population over which the authority of the charter is held to be binding.

The fourth infringement enumerated by the majority of the committee grows out of an act of the legislature of the State of Rhode Island entitled "An act to provide for the performance of the duties of governor in certain cases, and also for regulating the sitting of the general assembly." (See Digest of 1822, page 99.) By reference to the book here referred to, it will be perceived that this act also, in some form, was passed as early as 1663. The majority of the committee find in this act what they consider two material departures by the legislative power from the provisions of the charter. The first is found in the first section of the act which devolves the duties of governor upon the lieutenant-governor in case the office of governor shall be vacant "by reason of no election being made by the freemen, or by the governor's death or resignation, or in case of his absence from the State, or inability to perform the duties and functions of his office;" and in case of a vacancy, for similar reasons, of both the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor, the duties are devolved upon "the senior senator in rank for the time being." To determine how far this act may be assumed as an infringement upon the provisions of the charter, or a departure from them, those provisions, so far as the office and duties of the governor and deputy governor are concerned, should be examined; and the undersigned feels confident that such examination will not result in any necessary violation of, or departure from, the charter, to any extent whatever. The charter, in all cases, in speaking of the powers and duties of the governor, uses this or similar language: "And in his absence the deputy governor;" thus showing that the deputy governor, in case of the absence of the governor, whether occasioned by a vacancy in the office or otherwise, is to stand in his place and discharge his duties. It will be further seen that the governor, or, in his absence, the deputy governor, is constituted the presiding officer of the senate, and of the grand committee when the two houses are acting together as one body. Now, a vacancy may exist in both these offices at the same time, or during the absence of one a vacancy may be produced in the other. Still the senate, if in session, would require a presiding officer, and this law provides for the case. If a vacancy be occasioned in the office of governor, lieutenant-governor, or senator by death or removal from office, the legislature can fill the vacancy; but if vacancies for these causes should be produced in both the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor at the same time, the senate and grand committee would require a presiding officer and the State a person to do this duty until an election could be made by the legislature. The first section of this act is not understood to go any further than to make this provision, as the proviso would seem to negative the idea that this pro tempore governor can sign commissions, which is believed to be the only remaining important duty to be performed by the governor of the State. This, therefore, is not perceived to be an infringement of the charter in the sense in which it is used by the majority of the committee. The senator upon whom the duty is devolved in case the double contingency should happen must have been elected by the people as a member of the body over which he is to preside, and it is believed that by a fair implication from the charter itself the senate without this law would have had the right in the absence of both the governor and lieutenant-governor to have designated one of their body to preside over their deliberations.

The provision contained in the second section of the law authorizing the governor, or the person empowered to perform the duties of governor, to convene the legislature "when any emergent occasion shall require," and when the law shall not have provided for a meeting, forms the second ground assumed by the majority of the committee under this head. This provision, it is believed, instead of being a violation of or a departure from the charter, is expressly authorized by it. At pages 6 and 7 of the charter (see Digest of 1822 of the laws of Rhode Island) will be found the following provision:

"And further, we will and, by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, do ordain and grant that the governor of the said company for the time being, or in his absence by occasion of sickness or otherwise, by his leave and permission, the deputy governor for the time being, shall and may from time to time upon all occasions give order for the assembling of the said company and calling them together to consult and advise of the business and affairs of the said company."

Upon looking at the language of the charter it will be seen that its language when speaking of the legislature is most frequently "the governor, deputy governor, assistants, and company," and hence the conclusion is that the authority conferred in the above paragraph is to convene the legislature and not the whole body of the freemen of the whole colony, as the charter makes it the especial duty of the legislature and not of the whole body of the freemen "to consult and advise of the business and affairs of the said company." But if this view of this point be mistaken and the authority "to appoint times and places of the meeting of the general assembly" be, as the majority of the committee suppose, given to that body only, still it would appear to the undersigned not to be a usurpation of this legislative authority to fix those times and places so far as human foresight could measure the necessity of such meetings while the legislature should be together, and to provide that in case urgent occasion should require during any recess the governor should convene them. He cannot, therefore, view this provision in the legislation of the State as going at all to sanction the position for which it is referred to, that the legislature have not regarded the charter as the fundamental law of the State.

The majority of the committee draw an argument in favor of the power in the legislature of Rhode Island to pass laws fundamental in their character because that legislature has passed an act entitled "An act declaratory of certain rights of the people of this State," commonly called a bill of rights. They say that this bill "in all the other States emanates from the people in their primary capacity," while in Rhode Island it is a mere act of the legislature. The undersigned believes it to be true that most if not all of the States at the formation of their respective constitutions have either incorporated into that instrument or have accompanied it by a bill or declaration of rights which in the one shape or the other has received the approbation of the people in their primary assemblies, but he also believes that no State has presented to or had adopted by its freemen a bill or declaration of rights previous to the time of the formation of a State constitution for such State. He further believes that most if not all of the old States had bills of rights passed by their respective legislative assemblies prior to the time of the Revolution, and that those bills of rights remained with legislative sanction and authority only until the States respectively formed constitutions, and in or with them submitted to their people for their adoption their bills of rights. He therefore supposes that the majority of the committee in this instance reason from an analogy which does not exist, inasmuch as the State of Rhode Island has never yet formed a constitution, but remains in this respect as it was at the close of the Revolution, and with the same bill of rights and same form of government. But even if this argument should be allowed its full force it would not seem to the undersigned to prove anything as to the question under discussion. This bill of rights contains nothing which conflicts with any provision of the charter, and it would be one thing to determine that the legislature of Rhode Island possesses the power to pass laws in their character fundamental in cases where no such laws exist, and an entirely different thing to determine that that body possesses the power to pass such laws in contravention of the provisions of the charter, that being, so far as its provisions extend, the fundamental law of the State.

The majority of the committee further say in an enumeration of what they consider legislative infringements upon the charter, "the right of suffrage has been extended to a class of citizens who did not enjoy it under the charter." The undersigned presumes the majority of the committee are right in the fact stated, though his acquaintance with the laws of the State does not enable him to speak other than from the statement in the report; but an examination of the charter will show that this subject is expressly put within the enumerated powers of the legislature, and that therefore any extension of the right of suffrage by that body cannot be an infringement upon their chartered rights. The incorporating clause of the charter, after naming certain individuals, is in the following language: "And all such others as now are or hereafter shall be admitted and made free of the company and society of our colony of Providence Plantations, in the Narragansett Bay, in New England, shall be from time to time and forever hereafter a body corporate and politic in fact and name by the name of the Governor and Company of the English Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in New England, in America." (See Charter, page 5, Digest of 1822.)

Among the enumerated powers of the legislature is the following: "And to choose, nominate, and appoint such, and so many, other persons as they shall think fit, and shall be willing to accept the same, to be free of the said company and body politic, and them into the said company to admit." No extension, therefore, by the legislature of the right of suffrage to classes of citizens who did not possess that right at the time of the adoption of the charter could be an infringement upon that instrument, as it grants to the legislature this power, in express terms, to be used as it "shall think fit."

This closes the notice which the undersigned proposes to take of the legislative infringements upon the charter mentioned and relied upon by the majority of the committee to show that the legislature of Rhode Island does not, and has not for a long time, considered it as fundamental law binding its action; but there is one consideration equally applicable to all these alleged legislative encroachments, which ought not to be withheld. It is that the previous review, as well as the statements made by the majority of the committee, show that they all took place before the American Revolution, and while the State was a British colony. The charter, therefore, was then strictly and legally binding, for it was a grant by deed from the sovereign to his subjects, and they could take no rights under the charter which it did not grant, and exercise no powers derived from it in a manner different from that which it pointed out. The authorities and people of the colony were then one party to the charter and the sovereign was the other; and holding their authority, as they all did, by virtue of the charter, any act of those authorities which was in violation of it must have been legally void. It surely would not have been permitted to the colonists, while British subjects, to say, we have disobeyed and violated the charter; we have legislated above and beyond it; we have established a government not at all in conformity to its provisions; we have introduced a mode of elections which it does not authorize; we have organized a legislature upon principles contrary to its requirements, and which does not acknowledge its binding force, but sets up its acts as paramount to your charter; therefore we do not hold it to be the fundamental law of the colony. Still the most material of the legislative acts mentioned and relied upon to show that the charter has not been held to control the action of the legislative body organized under it were passed within three years after the date of the charter, and more than a century before those to whom it was granted ceased to be the subjects of the crown from which the grant was made. Can stronger evidence be required to show that these acts were never considered as violations of the spirit and meaning of the charter, either by the sovereign who granted or by the people who accepted and adopted it as their system of civil government? It would seem to the undersigned that this view of the subject must be conclusive against the interpretation given to these acts by the majority of the committee. He cannot, therefore, in any light in which he has been able to view the question, believe there is evidence to authorize the assumption that this charter of Charles II has not ever been, and is not now, considered by the people of Rhode Island as their constitution of government to the full extent of its provisions in their true spirit and meaning, with the single exception of those portions of it which were made obsolete by the American Revolution. On the contrary, the evidences are clear and strong to his mind to show that it has ever been held to be the fundamental law of that State by its people, its government, and its legislature (the act of January, 1832, alone forming a material exception).

and he refers to the present basis of representation in the popular branch of the legislature, and to the present mode of conducting the elections for general officers, as conclusive of the question.

This brings the undersigned to his second inquiry, to wit: Does the charter fix and prescribe the term of office of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State?

The language of the charter itself must settle this point. The whole of the paragraph has been quoted in the statement of facts given in the early part of this report, and a reference to that extract will show its requirement to be, "that yearly, once in the year, for ever hereafter, namely, the aforesaid Wednesday in May," "the governor, deputy governor, and assistants of the said company," "shall be" "newly chosen for the year ensuing." It is respectfully submitted that this language is definite and clear; that the term of one year is fixed by it as the period of service, or official term, of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of Rhode Island, by virtue of an election by the people to those offices, and that it does not admit of extension by any fair construction of the terms used or the meaning conveyed. Is there, then, anything in the charter to modify this construction of this provision? The majority of the committee seem to suppose there is, as in reference to this subject they use the following language: "It seems, on the contrary, to have been the intention of the crown to perpetuate the existence of the legislative power in the colony by an express provision that the authority, office, and power of the governor, deputy governor, and assistants shall cease and determine when their successors shall be elected and engaged, and not at the expiration of the term for which they were respectively chosen." The undersigned believes, had the majority of the committee extracted the passage of the charter to which they must have referred for the above opinion that they would have seen its want of applicability to the question they were discussing. The passage is considered as solely applicable to cases of removal from these offices by death or for cause, and not to vacancies occasioned in any other manner. As, however, the majority of the committee have seemed to consider it as susceptible of a different construction, the undersigned feels bound to give it to the Senate, that it may form its own opinion of its extent and application. It is in the following words: "And if it shall happen that the present governor, deputy governor, and assistants, by these presents appointed, or any such as shall hereafter be newly chosen into their rooms, or any of them, or any other the officers of the said company shall die, or be removed from his or their several offices or places before the said general day of election (whom we do hereby declare, for any misdemeanor or default, to be removable by the governor, assistants, and company, or such greater part of them, in any of the said public courts to be assembled as aforesaid), that then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said governor, deputy governor, assistants, and company aforesaid, or such greater part of them, so to be assembled as is aforesaid, in any of their assemblies, to proceed to a new election of one or more of their company, in the room or place, rooms or places, of such officer or officers, so dying or removed, according to their discretions; and immediately upon and after such election or elections made of such governor, deputy governor, assistant, or assistants, or any other officer of the said company, in manner and form aforesaid, the authority, office, and power before given to the former governor, deputy governor, and other officer or officers so removed, in whose stead and place new shall be chosen, shall, as to him and them, and every of them respectively, cease and determine."

A careful examination of this clause of the charter will show that it first contemplates a vacancy in the office of governor, deputy governor, or an assistant by death, or, second, by removal from office, which, "for any misdemeanor or default," it authorizes; and, in either case, it empowers the legislature to make an election to fill the vacancy so occasioned; and then declares that, after such election is made, "the authority, office, and power" of the officer "removed" shall "cease and determine." This is the whole scope of the provision, and the majority of the committee must, therefore, have been mistaken in supposing that it was applicable to a case of vacancy in any of these offices occasioned by a failure of the people to elect. It applies solely to elections made by the legislature; and there is no authority given by the charter to the legislature to fill a vacancy in the office of governor, deputy governor, or an assistant, occasioned in any other manner than by the death of the incumbent, or his removal from office for some "misdemeanor or default."

The undersigned finds no other provision in the charter which can, to his understanding, be possibly supposed to have any application to the official terms of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators; and as he cannot suppose the clause last above quoted and referred to can be understood as reaching any cases other than the two classes of cases he has mentioned, to wit, the death of the incumbent, and his removal from office for cause, he is forced to the conclusion that the charter does limit the term of office of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators to one year, "the year ensuing" the pronunciation of their election in the general assembly convened at Newport; and that there is nothing in the other provisions of that instrument to qualify this limitation.

Can, then, the legislature of the State, consistently with the powers granted to that body by the charter, extend the official terms of those officers beyond the limits fixed by the charter?

This inquiry would seem to have been already answered; for, if it be admitted that the charter is the fundamental law of the State, and, as such, binding upon its legislature, and that it does fix the official terms of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators at one year, it must follow that an extension of those terms beyond the period fixed by the charter would be an act of legislation above and beyond the charter in a case where it makes express provision, and, therefore, an act of legislation not authorized by the charter, but in direct violation of it. Such are the impressions fully entertained by the undersigned; but it is his duty to notice some of the positions by which the majority of the committee sustain themselves in an opposite conclusion.

It will at once be seen that this discussion involves the constitutionality and validity of so much of the act of January, 1832, as extends the terms of office of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators in case of a failure to elect by the people, and therefore has direct reference to the arguments by which the majority of the committee sustain that act.

The first position, in order, taken by the majority of the committee, which it is proposed to notice, is laid down in the following words: "Your committee hold it to be an undeniable principle, applicable to all forms of government, that there must exist in the supreme legislative power of the State a capacity to preserve itself from annihilation."

This is a position to the soundness of which the undersigned cannot subscribe as applicable to any of the forms of government adopted by any of the States of this Union, or by the Federal Government. He supposes Congress to be "the supreme legislative power" of this Government, but Congress has by the Constitution of the United States no capacity to preserve itself from annihilation. If the people should fail to elect members to the House of Representatives, or if the legislatures of the States should fail to elect members to the Senate, there would be no Congress, nor could Congress itself continue itself beyond the terms for which its members have been elected, or in any other way, by its action, bring a new Congress into existence. Congress, therefore, which is the supreme legislative power of the United States, has not the capacity to preserve its continued existence, or to prevent its own annihilation.

The undersigned, from the time allowed him to prepare this report, has not been able to examine very extensively the constitutions of the several States, nor have his former researches made him familiar with the minute provisions of those instruments; but from the examinations he has been enabled to make he entertains the opinion that no such power is conferred upon any one of the legislative bodies organized by those instruments as that of continuing itself in official existence, by its own act, beyond the term for which its members were elected. He believes that the members of the legislatures of all the States are elective by the freemen of the respective States, and in the constitutions of some no provision is made for a failure by the people to elect, and no mode of remedying such failure but that of a resubmission to the people has ever been attempted by the legislatures of those States. The constitutions of other States provide for filling the vacancies which may exist from failures to elect by the choice of such of the members of one or both branches of the new legislature as may have been elected, generally confining that choice to a certain number of the candidates voted for by the people for the office to be filled. Other States, where legal quorums are elected, suffer the vacancies occasioned by a failure to elect to remain unfilled until another regular election. There may be cases where the constitution of a State provides that the members of the old legislature shall continue to act until others are elected and qualified to fill their places, but the undersigned has been able to find no such case, nor does he believe that one exists. He believes that the constitution of every State fixes definitely the length of the official term of the members of its legislature, and that without a re-election by the people, or some other re-election or reappointment prescribed by the constitution of the State, the official powers of every member of the State legislatures cease with the close of the term for which he was elected, whether any other person be or be not qualified to discharge the same duties.

Surely, in the first class of the above cases, where the State constitution makes no provision for a failure to elect, and a new election is the only remedy within the power of the legislature, "the capacity to preserve itself from annihilation" does not exist in the legislature, the official terms of the members of which have expired. That capacity is in the people alone, and their election must determine the continuance or not of the legislative power.

In the second class of cases, where vacancies occasioned by a failure to elect are to be filled by such members of one or both branches of the new legislature as may have been elected, the capacity may exist in each legislature to preserve itself but not its succession; and even this must depend upon the success of the people in electing a portion of the members; for if there should be a failure to elect the whole, or if the people should hold no election, there would be no one authorized to fill vacancies, and annihilation would follow. Such a legislature, therefore, has only sub modo the "capacity to preserve itself from annihilation," and has not at all that capacity in the sense in which the majority of the committee are understood to use it, to preserve its succession.

The third class, where the constitution of the State authorizes the members of the existing legislature to hold their offices and exercise their powers until others are elected or appointed and duly qualified to take their places, if indeed such a provision exists in the constitution of any one of the States, is still not a capacity which exists in the legislative power to preserve itself from annihilation, but a provision which exists in the constitution of the State to preserve its legislature from annihilation. The power or capacity is constitutional and not legislative, and, therefore, even in this class of cases does not bear out the majority of the committee in the position they have laid down.

The undersigned may have misapprehended the meaning which the majority of the committee intended to give to the position itself, as they may have attached to the terms "supreme legislative power of the State" ideas which, as used, they have not conveyed to his mind. He has considered them as used in reference to the legislative bodies of the United States, and to legislative bodies acting in subjection to fundamental law paramount to the powers of the legislative authority—indeed, from which the legislature derives its authority. If the position has not been taken in this sense, then the undersigned must admit that his replies to it may be a departure from the intention of the proposition; but he must at the same time say that he thinks, in any other sense, the proposition is a departure from the argument it is used to support.

The next position assumed by the majority of the committee to sustain this act of January, 1832, is that neither in the charter nor in the bill of rights, "nor in any other act or instrument now in force, is there to be found any prohibition of the power to continue over an existing legislature until their successors shall be duly chosen and engaged." The reasoning to support this position is that the constitutions of the several States are in the broadest sense popular, and that the legislative power granted by them embraces every object not expressly prohibited by some provision in the instrument itself, or by a bill of rights. In reference to powers legislative in their nature and character, and not enumerated or particularly granted, this reasoning and the deduction from it may be generally sound as applicable to the State constitutions. It is respectfully submitted, however, that the establishment and organization of the legislative bodies, and as a necessary part of that establishment and organization the limitation of the terms of the members is, under our system, a constitutional and not a legislative power, and therefore, not coming within the scope of the reasoning of the committee, cannot be controlled by the conclusion drawn from that reasoning. But in the present case this point is not left to reasoning and inference. We have already seen that the terms of the members of the senate of Rhode Island are specifically fixed by the charter to one year. The constitution has provided for the case in terms, and its grant is positive, definite, and clear. It surely then will not be contended that this term may be extended without a violation of the grant, because the granting clause does not contain a prohibition against its violation. It is a settled rule of construction that an affirmative and positive grant, clear and intelligible in its terms, is itself a negative of what is not granted. The Constitution of the United States fixes the term of a Senator at six years; and it surely would have been considered surplusage in that instrument to have added that the term of a Senator should be no more than six years; nor will it be supposed that Congress can prolong that term because that negative is not affixed to the grant. This position, therefore, cannot sustain the action of the legislature of Rhode Island in attempting by a legislative act to prolong the term of the senators of that State beyond the period limited and prescribed by the fundamental law of the State.

The majority of the committee further contend that the people of the State of Rhode Island sanctioned the act of January, 1832, by holding elections pursuant to its provisions. The undersigned believes that in using this argument the majority of the committee have not taken the proper distinction between the different provisions of that act. It has not been contended, to the knowledge of the undersigned, that those parts of the act which directed new elections in cases of failure to elect at the annual elections were unconstitutional or invalid. On the contrary, he understands that those provisions of the law are insisted upon as valid and binding, and that it is complained that the house of representatives did not carry them into effect according to their plain intent and meaning. It will be found to have been made a distinct point by Mr. Potter in his argument that even supposing all parts of the law of January, 1832, were constitutional and valid, the election of Mr. Robbins to the Senate was improperly made, because if that law had been properly carried into effect there would have been two or three sessions of the legislature of the State between January, 1833, when that election was made, and the 3d of March, 1833, when his former term expired; while the law of the State regulating the election of United States Senators requires that election to be made "at the session of the general assembly next preceding the expiration of the term of service of the Senator for the time being, and not before."

His reasoning upon the subject is that it was the intention of that law that elections should be held as frequently as that could be done, the returns made, and the results ascertained, until a choice of governor, lieutenant-governor and senators should be effected; that the law fixed the period of thirty days as the longest notice which should be given of a special election to be held under it; that several of those elections were held upon a much shorter notice, and proved that elections might be held once in thirty days without difficulty; that these elections were continued at intervals differing not very widely from this until the October session of the legislature in 1832; that after that period but one election was held under the law; that at the session in January, 1833, the legislature, instead of adjourning to such a day as would give time for another trial to elect a senate, and so continuing to do from time to time until the law made it imperative upon them to elect a Senator, at any time before or even on the 3d day of March, 1833, then proceeded to make that election, the house of representatives having first resolved that they would order no more elections under the law; that by this proceeding the persons acting as the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senate, under the law of January, 1832, who were elected in April, 1831, without any reference to the election of a Senator, were made actors in that election, and actually gave their votes for Mr. Robbins, by which votes he was elected, when, if new elections had been ordered, as they should have been, other sessions of the legislature would have intervened between January and March, and the people would have had an opportunity to elect a governor, lieutenant-governor, and senate, with a view to the election of a Senator; that the fact that an election was effected at the first trial after November, 1832, proves very clearly that had elections been ordered some choice would have been effected before March, 1833, and before the expiration of the then term of Mr. Robbins; while the total change produced by the election in the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senate proves conclusively that the public will was not represented by the former incumbents of those offices.

These suggestions are given here in as condensed a form as possible, that the Senate may allow them such weight in the decision of this important controversy as this body may think they deserve. They must in any event satisfy the Senate that these elections, held in obedience to the law of January, 1832, furnish no evidence of the acquiescence of the people of that State in any of the provisions of that law other than those applicable to the special elections, the validity of which provisions have not been and are not now disputed. Indeed, from the fact that that law charged the house of representatives alone with the execution of this portion of it, an argument has been drawn that it was not the intention of the legislature which passed the act that any business of an official or legislative character should be performed by the senate after the expiration of their constitutional terms, and that the provisions in the law for the official continuance of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators was designed as a mere formal continuance of the legislative body until an election by the people should be effected. The terms of the act, however, as will be seen by a reference to it, go very strongly to contradict this construction of it.

Another position taken by the majority of the committee to sustain the validity of the act of January, 1832, is based upon the action of the supreme judicial court of the State of Rhode Island. The paper annexed, marked O, contains the evidence of the proceedings referred to. The facts seem to be that a person by the name of Miner was indicted in September, 1832, for murder; that he was tried in March, 1833, before this court, convicted, and sentenced to be hung in July, 1833. He presented to the court an application for a habeas corpus, upon the ground that the judges had not been appointed by a competent legislature, and were not, therefore, empowered to try and sentence him. The court refused the application, but the grounds of the decision are not stated. It is contended that this decision was a pronunciation of the judgment of that court in favor of the validity of the law of January, 1832. Mr. Potter makes two answers to this point. The first is that the statute of the State expressly denies to this court the authority to grant a habeas corpus on the application of persons "committed for a capital crime," "or persons convict" (see the Revised Laws of Rhode Island of 1822, page 181). To this it is replied, as it would seem to the undersigned, with much force, that notwithstanding the prohibition of the statute it would be competent for the court to examine such an application where the allegation was that the whole proceedings had been coram non judice, and, if such should, in their judgments, be the fact, that the case would not come within the prohibition of the statute and the writ might be granted. The second answer is that the judges of this court were the same persons from the first Wednesday in May, 1831, until the first Wednesday in May, 1833; that it is admitted on all hands that their appointments and terms of service were within the power of the legislature, though the practice has been to make the appointments annually; that these judges were properly appointed and commissioned in 1831; that a resolution having the force of a law is always passed by every legislature of Rhode Island declaring that all officers in whose places no others have been appointed by the legislature or who have not been themselves reappointed shall continue to hold their respective offices until others shall be duly appointed and qualified to take their places; that a similar resolution was passed by the legislature in office from May, 1831, to May, 1832; that these judges did hold their offices and continue to discharge their duties as judges by virtue of their appointment in 1831, and of the resolution above described until August, 1832, although their year expired in the month of May, 1832; that the body acting as the legislature in August, 1832, but whose right so to act is now disputed, did in that month assume to reappoint these judges, but it is said that if it shall be determined that this body was not the legislature of the State authorized to perform the constitutional duties of the legislature of the State, then their assuming to reappoint these judges would neither add to nor take from the powers they possessed before that act was performed; that they were continuing in office at the time by virtue of the resolution before mentioned; that they would so continue until removed from office or reappointed by a constitutional legislature; and that therefore their decision in the case referred to does not necessarily carry with it the decision of that court in favor of the validity of the act of January, 1832, because if they had decided expressly that that law was invalid and their purported reappointment in August, 1832, void, they would still have been compelled to decide that they were in office by virtue of the resolution of the previous competent legislature as well after as before August, and, being so in office, were a competent court to try and sentence the criminal in question. This reasoning seems to the undersigned to follow necessarily from the facts, and to render wholly inconclusive this action of the court as a decision in favor of the validity of the law under consideration.

The legislature which declared void the election of Mr. Robbins and elected Mr. Potter, in the preamble to the act making that declaration denominate the body which made the election of Mr. Robbins "the general assembly," and assign as the ground upon which they declare void their proceedings in that particular the non-compliance with the act of January, 1832. The majority of the committee consider this an admission sustaining the validity of that act. This same legislature also, at their first session, repealed the act of January, 1832, without expressing any opinion in the repealing act that the act to be repealed was not valid. This the majority of the committee also consider an admission to the same effect. How far admissions by this subsequent legislature, if made, would render valid an unconstitutional law passed by a preceding legislature, or how far such admissions are to be considered evidence of the constitutionality of such a law, when that is the point in issue, are questions which the undersigned leaves to the determination of the Senate. These admissions, however, appear to him to have been made, so far as they can be considered admissions at all, under circumstances which should be considered. The Legislature of Rhode Island, at its October session, in the year 1833, pass an act in which they declare the election of Mr. Robbins to the Senate "to be null and void, and of no effect," and that the office of Senator is vacant; not that the office is thereby vacated, but that it is "vacant." To that act they affix a preamble, in which they term the body of men which made the election that they are about to declare void "the general assembly," and accuse them of a non-compliance with the law by virtue of which they held their offices; and this preamble is followed by the law which declares null and void the act referred to. Now, it would not do to assume that anything contained in this preamble was designed as an admission of the validity of the election of Mr. Robbins, because it was the sole object of it, and of the law to which it is the preamble, to declare that election void; and it will not be contended that the preamble to any legislative act is to be so construed as to contradict, defeat, and overrule the act itself, which is the only part of the proceeding having validity. This legislature, then, did not intend to admit that Mr. Robbins had been validly elected to the Senate of the United States, but to deny that fact, and to declare not voidable but void the proceeding by which he purported to have been so elected; and the preamble to the act must be so understood and construed as to be consistent with this intention. Two grounds were assumed upon which that election was void: 1st. That the law of January, 1832, so far as it purported to continue the terms of office of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, was in direct violation of the constitution of the State, and therefore void, and that the persons assuming to act as a governor and senate in the election of Mr. Robbins were not constitutionally a governor and senate, and were not authorized so to act. 2d. That the governor and senate for the time being held their offices, not by virtue of an election by the people, but by virtue of the act of January, 1832, and that a failure to comply strictly with the provisions of that act had put an end to the powers they derived from it, and therefore that they had no power to act in the election of a Senator. The subsequent legislature appear from this preamble to their act to have assumed the latter ground as the foundation of their action, and anything in the shape of an admission in the preamble would seem to be properly referable to the views they entertained, and upon which they were acting, and not to connect itself with a view of the subject which does not appear from their proceedings to have influenced their action. If, therefore, the ground assumed by this legislature should be held to be untenable, and the ground first above mentioned, to wit, that the act of January, 1832, so far as it purports to extend the official terms of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, is in direct violation of the constitution of the State, and therefore void, be well taken, the undersigned is unable to discover that anything in the admissions supposed to be contained in this preamble can weaken or overturn it. In reference to the admission supposed to be drawn from the silence of the act repealing the act of January, 1832, the undersigned will simply remark that this was an act to repeal a law parts of which were held to be unconstitutional and void, and other parts of which were admitted on all hands to be valid and binding as law; and under these circumstances he cannot consider the absence of a declaration pointing out those parts which were held to be unconstitutional, inasmuch as it was the object of the legislature to repeal the whole act, as going very far to sanction the whole act.

The majority of the committee mention the action of the legislature of Rhode Island in relation to the election of members of Congress and the introduction of the plurality instead of the majority of votes to elect in the choice of those officers as going to show the extent to which the legislature have gone in regulating elections, contrary to the long-established customs of the State. Two remarks may be made in relation to this argument. The first is, that the charter could not necessarily have contained any provision in relation to the election of these officers, inasmuch as it was granted for the government of a British colony, and not of the State of Rhode Island as a member of the confederacy of States composing this Government, and was granted more than a century before such a thing as a Congress of the United States of America was known or had existence; whence, from necessity, the legislature must have full power over that whole subject. The second is, that the fact that the legislature of Rhode Island extended, by law, the plurality mode of election to the choice of members of Congress where the charter does not interfere, and did not extend it to the election of officers of the State government where the charter prescribes the majority principle, affords at least as strong an inference in favor of their sense of the binding and paramount influence of the charter, where it does direct, as of any disposition to treat it lightly by disregarding the mere analogy when acting upon a case not known to the charter.

So much for the arguments which have been adduced by the majority of the committee to sustain the validity of the act of January, 1832.

In corroboration of the point now under discussion, however, to wit, that the terms of the governor and senate can be continued beyond the year, the majority of the committee assume that these officers always have held over until the election was completed and their successors qualified. A perfect understanding of the facts, it is believed, will make this point plain. From the statments of the parties annexed, and before referred to, it is to be seen that the practice of the legislature of Rhode Island has ever been to adjourn to meet on the day previous to that fixed in the charter for the annual election, and that pursuant to such adjournment, a quorum of both houses assemble on that day always at Newport, the place named in the charter for holding the annual elections. It is undoubtedly true, as the majority of the committee remark, that when the people all assembled and voted at that place they might remain together until an election was effected, and that the governor and senate of the former year might remain until that result was ascertained, but there is not found any provision in the charter making them at that time presiding officers of the election or imposing upon them any other official duties after the opening of the election. The new house of representatives always assembled on the day fixed for the election, and took the oaths of office on that day. They always acted as the canvassers of the votes, and the result of the election was declared by that body. Since the system of voting by proxy, as before described, has been adopted, the proxies have always been returned to Newport and canvassed by the new house of representatives, as the votes given by the people there assembled formerly were. They declare the result as they formerly did, and the election is closed. If a governor, lieutenant-governor, and senate are found to be elected, the persons elected are sworn, and the legislature is organized; and as an election of a governor, lieutenant-govenor, and a quroum of the senate has never failed to be made until the first Wednesday in May, 1832, the history of the government of the colony and State furnishes no precedent for such a case as that under consideration, where the former governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, or any of those officers, have held over and attempted to perform official acts because successors were not elected. That history does, however, present several instances where the whole number of senators have not been elected and no attempt has been made to fill the vacancies by a new election, or in any other manner, nor have the former incumbents of the vacant seats ever claimed to hold over the terms for which they were elected, but the vacancies have in all such cases been suffered to remain for the year. It should be further remarked that no evidence is found to show that any election has occupied more than the day fixed in the charter, so that any presumption of a holding over of these officers in consequence of a failure to elect on that day is unsupported by evidence.

From these facts it would seem to the undersigned to follow necessarily that the old governor and senate are brought together by the adjournment of the legislature to the day previous to the election; that subsequent to that day, unless re-elected, they have never had any official duty to perform, and have never performed any; that the right to hold over, in case of a failure to elect, had not been admitted in the practice of the government under the charter, because repeated instances have happened where failures to fill places in the senate have occurred and the incumbents have not continued to occupy them, but they have remained vacant for the whole year; that the holding over referred to by the majority of the committee has relation only to the day of election, and then these officers, unless re-elected, have no official duties to perform; and that, therefore, the holding over of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of that State from the first Wednesday in May, 1832, to the first Wednesday in May, 1833, in consequence of a failure of the people to elect, was not sanctioned by any former practice of the government under the charter, and must be held to have been done by virtue of and in obedience to the act of January, 1832, and not by virtue of any provision in the charter or in conformity with any former precedent.

The opinion of the undersigned as to the validity of such of the provisions of that law as assumed to extend the official terms of these officers has been given in his remarks under the two first heads of this report, where it will be seen that he has come to the conclusion that the charter is to be regarded as to this question as the fundamental law of the State, binding upon its legislature, and that it does limit specifically their official terms to one year.

As it has been intimated in some one of the statements of fact that the duty of swearing the new governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators devolved upon the old officers as an official act to be performed by them after the election had been effected, it may be proper to refer here to the paper annexed, marked P, to show that, for a long term of years at least, this duty has been performed by the secretary of state, and not by them.

This brings the undersigned to his fourth inquiry, which is: Can the Senate of the United States, when these questions are presented to it by the action of the legislature of the State of Rhode Island, in the purported election of a member for this body, look into and pronounce its opinion upon them by way of inquiry into the right of a sitting member to the seat he occupies?

Two bodies of men, calling themselves the senate and house of representatives of the State of Rhode Island, and together acting as the legislature of that State from the first Wednesday in May, 1832, to the first Wednesday in May, 1833, did, in January, 1833, assume to elect Asher Robbins to the Senate of the United States for the term of six years from and after the 3d day of March then next, to fill a vacancy to be produced by the expiration of his then term of office on the last-mentioned day. Mr. Robbins received a majority of the votes given by these two bodies of men for the office, and the election was conducted according to the forms pursued by the legislature of Rhode Island in the election of Senators. The result of the election was pronounced in the usual manner, and the person acting as governor of the State at the time issued to Mr. Robbins a commission in the usual form, and authenticated in the usual manner, for the office. This commission was presented to and read in the Senate of the United States on the 4th day of February, 1833, and placed upon the files of that body.

This election of Mr. Robbins was protested against by several members of the house of representatives of that State soon after it was made (see protest annexed, marked Q), and has ever since been alleged to have been void, on the ground that the persons acting as the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State at the time of the election, and aiding in making it, were not constitutionally the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State, nor authorized to perform that act, and, of consequence, that the person acting as the governor of the State, and as such signing Mr. Robbins's commission, was not constitutionally the governor of the State, nor authorized to perform that act. In the month of October, 1833, two other bodies of men, admitted to be the senate and house of representatives of the State of Rhode Island, were assembled and constituted the legislature of that State, and while so assembled this legislature passed the law to be found annexed to the report of the majority of the committee, and marked A, declaring the election of Mr. Robbins "null and void, and of no effect," and the office to be "vacant." This same legislature then proceeded to elect a Senator to fill the vacancy which they alleged existed by the expiration of Mr. Robbins's former term in March previous, and, upon counting the votes given, Elisha R. Potter was found to have received a majority of the whole, and was declared to have been duly elected. The election was conducted in the usual manner, and the person admitted to be the governor of the State issued to Mr. Potter a commission for the office in the usual form, and with the proper authentications. This commission was presented to the Senate of the United States and read in that body on the first day of its present session, and at the same time Mr. Robbins and Mr. Potter both presented themseves at the bar, and each offered to take the oath of office as a Senator of the United States from the State of Rhode Island.

This is believed to be a sufficient summary of the facts to present this point intelligibly to the Senate. It will be seen from them that the question is raised upon the action of a body admitted on all hands to have been a constitutionally organized legislature of the State of Rhode Island, declaring "null and void, and of no effect," an important act of a preceding body claiming to be the legislature of that State, but the organization of which was peculiar, and the constitutionality and legality of whose acts are questioned.

The Senate, by the Constitution, is made "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," and can it, under this power, look into these facts to determine which of the persons claiming the seat as a Senator from Rhode Island is entitled to represent that State in this body?

No question appears to the undersigned to be raised as to the "returns" or "qualifications" of either of the claimants, and he therefore considers that the question of "election" is the only one presented for decision. This question the Senate has the power to determine, because it is made "the judge of the elections" of its own members. The facts in this case show that the legislature of the State of Rhode Island declare, in the solemn form of a law of the State, that Mr. Robbins has not been elected to the Senate; that the proceedings from which his commisson proceeded were "null and void, and of no effect," because the body taking them were not authorized to elect a Senator; and that the place was "vacant" at the time when this declaration was made. Still, notwithstanding this solemn declaration by a body conceded to be the legislature of the State, Mr. Robbins produces to the Senate, and there is referred to the committee, a commission in due form, according to the laws and the practice of the government of Rhode Island, to show that Mr. Robbins had been duly elected a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States. Will the Senate look behind this commission to determine whether or not it was properly granted? The undersigned believes that it is not only the right but the duty of the Senate to do so. The commission is only the evidence of the election of a Senator, and if the Senate were to limit its inquiries to the proper form and authentication of the commission it would only make itself the judge of the evidence of an election, not the judge of the election itself. The undersigned supposes that the evidence of an election to an office is, in all cases, prima facie only, and is susceptible of being controverted and contradicted before a tribunal competent to judge of the election; he therefore supposes that the regularity of the evidence of an election may be one thing and that the election may be a very different thing; and he concludes that, as the Senate is constituted not the judge of the evidence of the elections of its members only, but "the judge of the elections" of its members, it may and, in all cases of a contested election where the contest does not arise as to the regularity of the evidence simply, should look behind the evidence and into the election itself, that it may determine what it is constituted the judge to determine, the fact of election, or, in other words, that it may determine whether the prima facie evidence laid before it is the real evidence of facts or is subject to contradiction by the facts.

The terms of the Constitution would seem to confirm this construction of the powers of the Senate. It is "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." The "returns" must refer to the commissions or other evidences of election of the members of this body as separate from the "elections" or "qualifications," and of the "returns" the Senate is the judge. Again, the "qualifications" must relate to the age, citizenship, residence, and other personal qualifications of the person elected, and of these "qualifications" the Senate is also the judge, and these are matters to be determined separate from the "elections" and "returns." So also the Senate is the judge of the "elections" of its members as separate from the "returns and qualifications." The three enumerations would seem to be separate subjects, upon each of which the Senate is to judge in the performance of its constitutional duty; and as a judgment upon the returns is made a separate matter from a judgment upon the election, the inference would seem to be irresistible that an examination behind the returns was contemplated, that a judgment upon the election, independent of the return, might be formed.

Against this construction of the constitutional powers and duties of the Senate the majority of the committee interpose objections which are of a consequential character mostly, but which will be considered. The committee say "it would be a dangerous exertion of power to look behind the commission for defects in the component parts of the legislature, or into the peculiar organization of the body for reasons to justify the Senate in declaring its acts absolutely null and void. Such a power, if carried to its legitimate extent, would subject the entire scope of State legislation to be overruled by our decision, and even the right of suffrage of individual members of the legislature whose elections were contested might be set aside. It would also lead to investigation into the motives of members in casting their votes for the purpose of establishing a charge of bribery or corruption in particular cases."

Reserving for the present the consideration of the extent to which the consequences of adjudging any act unconstitutional, or illegal, or invalid may be properly used as an argument against such an adjudication, the undersigned respectfully suggests that in his judgment the consequences here mentioned do not necessarily follow the decision apprehended. He understands it to be a necessary rule of all legislative bodies empowered to judge of the "elections, returns, and qualifications" of their own members that the person presenting the prima facie evidence of membership is allowed to take his seat, and is fully authorized to act until such prima facie evidence of right is overruled by the judgment of the body; and he never heard it doubted or questioned that the votes of a member so sitting were as valid for all purposes as the votes of a member whose seat was not contested, and whose right to a seat was not questioned. Indeed, if it were not so the admission of a member to a seat in a legislative body until his election, return, and qualifications had been definitely adjudged would be an absurdity. It would be the admission into the body of a voter who might, by the adjudication of the body itself, vitiate its whole proceedings.

So also in the case supposed by the majority of the committee of alleged bribery and corruption. The undersigned has always supposed that a member of a legislative body who should accept a bribe was punishable for the crime; but he has never understood, nor does he now understand, that the vote of the member given under the corrupt influence vitiated the proceeding voted upon or rendered either void or voidable by legal adjudication such proceeding. The member bribed is still constitutionally and legally a member of the body notwithstanding his corruption, and retains all his rights and all his powers as a member until conviction for the crime ousts him from his seat.

Hence it is concluded that the consequences above enumerated cannot follow the decision involved in the present controversy, whatever that decision may be, as the question presented is not whether the persons who did act as the governor and senate of Rhode Island, or some other persons claiming the right so to act, were the proper persons to discharge the duties of those offices; but the question is, were the persons who did so act constitutionally and legally, even by any prima facie claim, the governor and senate of that State, and as such authorized to vote upon the election of a Senator?

Again, the majority of the committee say "such a power does not belong to the Federal Government, and would, if claimed and carried out to its full extent, annihilate all the reserved rights of the States. It is a general principle of national law applicable to all distinct and independent governments, that if there arise any disputes in a state on the fundamental laws and administration, or on the prerogatives of the different powers of which it is composed, it is the business of the state alone to judge and determine them in conformity to its political constitution. No government has a right to intrude into the domestic affairs of another state, and attempt to influence its deliberations, or to control its action."

These principles may be perfectly sound when applied to nations wholly disconnected with and independent of each other; but the undersigned respectfully submits that they cannot be applicable to governments related to and connected with each other, as are the governments of the States of this Confederacy and the Federal Government, of which the States are component parts, and especially when the question is the proper representation of the State in that branch of the Federal Legislature where its sovereignty is represented in the particular manner pointed out by the Federal Constitution. Upon such a question, that instrument, and not the general principles of international law, must govern the decision. We have already seen that the Constitution makes it the duty of the Senate to judge of the "elections" of its members. Another provision of that instrument says "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof;" and the question now directly presented is, was Mr. Robbins chosen by the legislature of the State of Rhode Island? It would seem to the undersigned, with all deference to the opinion expressed by the majority of the committee, that the Senate cannot judge of the election of that individual unless it can look into and decide this question, and that to determine this to be an unauthorized interference on the part of the Federal Government in the domestic affairs of the government of the State of Rhode Island would be to determine that the Senate cannot, in the most important point always involved, "judge of the elections" of its own members; that it cannot judge whether or not they were chosen by the legislatures of the States, when the Constitution expressly requires that they should be so chosen.

In this connection, the majority of the committee seem to place much stress upon another argument, entirely consequential in its character, which is, that a decision by the Senate that the body of men who elected Mr. Robbins was not the legislature of Rhode Island will be in effect a decision that all the laws passed by that body, acting as the legislature of that State, and all its other acts performed in that capacity, are null and void. Inasmuch as the State has now, and has had since the first Wednesday in May, 1833, a legislature admitted on all hands to be constitutionally chosen and organized, it would appear to the undersigned that the majority of the committee give an unnecessary importance to this consequence of such a decision in case the consequence must follow; because the evils apprehended, to a very great extent, if not to the entire extent, might be remedied by the action of the competent legislature in affirmance of the acts to be affected. But, however this may be, he cannot but consider it a plain proposition, and not requiring argument to support it, that when the constitutional organization of a body of men claiming to be the legislature of a State is the question in issue, the acts of that body whose constitutional powers are disputed are not to be adduced as evidence of the constitutional power of the body to perform them. When the constitutionality of a legislative act is questioned, he cannot believe that the act itself is to be relied upon as evidence of its own validity. Equally clear is it to his mind that when such a question is to be determined the consequences of pronouncing the act invalid are not considerations which should legitimately control the decision. The act is either constitutional or unconstitutional. If constitutional, the dispute is settled; if unconstitutional, no consequences to follow from a pronunciation of that fact can make it valid. So with the body claiming to be the legislature of a State. If the legislature of the State according to the provisions of its constitution, the controversy is at an end; if not the legislature of the State, no acts of theirs in their assumed character, and no consequences to follow from the invalidity of those acts, can give them the powers which they had not when the acts were performed, or make them, what they were not, the legislature of the State. But if consequences can be legitimately considered in the argument, the undersigned feels compelled to say that to his mind a decision that the State of Rhode Island has no fundamental law or constitution of government but the will of its legislature will be a consequence to its people much more serious than any which can be apprehended from pronouncing void the acts of the body of men assuming to be the legislature of the State from May, 1832, to May, 1833.

The undersigned then concludes that the charter of Charles II granted to the colony of Rhode Island and the Providence Plantations (now the State of Rhode Island) in the year 1663, and submitted to and adopted by the people of the colony in the year 1663 and 1664, is now to be considered the fundamental law of the State of Rhode Island, and binding upon its legislature as a constitution of government, except so far as the provisions of that charter were rendered obsolete by the American Revolution; that that charter does fix, and specifically limit, the official terms of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the State to one year; that the legislature of the State have not the power to extend those official terms beyond that limit; and that the Senate, upon a question as to the election of a Senator, has the right to inquire whether he was chosen by the legislature of his State, and, consequently, whether any body of men assuming to choose a Senator were authorized, as members of the legislature of their State, to make the choice under the provisions of the constitution of such State.

It being conceded that the official terms of one year of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of Rhode Island had expired in May, 1832, and that they continued from that period until May, 1833, to act in those offices, respectively, without any new election by the people, the undersigned is compelled to conclude that they acted during that period without constitutional authority, and that they were not, after May, 1832, members of the legislature of that State, and were not, therefore, in January, 1833, when they did so act, empowered to vote in the choice of a senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States. And inasmuch as the Constitution requires either a governor, or lieutenant-governor, and at least six senators to constitute, with the house of representatives, a legislature; and as there were no such officers in constitutional existence in the State of Rhode Island in January, 1833, when Mr. Robbins purports to have been chosen a Senator, he is brought to the further conclusion that that choice was not made by the legislature of the State.

Has, then, Mr. Potter been validly elected a Senator from that State? That the body by which he was chosen was the legislature of the State has not been questioned; but in speaking upon that point the majority of the committee express the opinion that that legislature had no "authority to proceed to the election of another Senator until the seat of the Senator-elect had been vacated by a solemn decision of the Senate of the United States." If, speaking legally and constitutionally, there was a Senator-elect, then this opinion is unquestionably sound, as it will not be contended that any legislature of a State has the power to vacate a seat in the Senate. To be more explicit and intelligi-ble, if Mr. Robbins's election was voidable only, and not void, a subsequent legislature could not act until the vacancy was produced by the decision of the Senate. But if, as the undersigned has expressed his opinion, the election of Mr. Robbins was not made by the legislature of the State, then it was not voidable, but absolutely void; it was not an election within the requirement of the Constitution of the United States, and the vacancy existed from the expiration of his former term in March, 1833. If the Senate shall come to this conclusion, then the undersigned is not aware of any ground upon which it can be contended that any constitutionally organized legislature of the State had not the power to fill that vacancy, or that the election of Mr. Potter made by such a legislature in October, 1833, is not valid.

All which is respectfully submitted.

[Twenty-eighth Congress—First session.]

JOHN M. NILES,

Senator from Connecticut from December 21, 1835, till March 3, 1839, and from May 16, 1844, till March 3, 1849.

Mr. Niles was elected to the Senate for the term beginning March 4, 1843. His credentials were not presented until April 30, 1844, when the Senate resolved that they be referred "to a select committee, consisting of five members, who shall be instructed to inquire into the election, return, and qualification of the said John M. Niles, and into his capacity at this time to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States." Some members of the Senate doubted the constitutional power of the Senate to make such an inquiry. May 16, 1844, the committee reported that he had been duly elected, and that they "are satisfied that Mr. Niles is at this time laboring under mental and physical debility, but is not of 'unsound mind' in the technical sense of that phrase; that the faculties of his mind are subject to the control of his will, and there is no sufficient reason why he be not qualified and permitted to take his seat as a member of the Senate." They reported the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Hon. John M. Niles be permitted to take the oath of a Senator in the Congress of the United States, and to take his seat as a member of the Senate." The resolution was adopted.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 1st sess. 28th Cong., and the report of the committee copied from the original on file at the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

The debates are found on pages 564, 565, 602, 603 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 28th Cong., vol. 13, part 1.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1844.

Mr. Fairfield presented the credentials of the Hon. John M. Niles, elected a Senator by the general assembly of the State of Connecticut for the term of six years commencing the 4th day of March, 1843; which were read.

Mr. Jarnagin submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the credentials presented to the Senate of the election of John M. Niles to be a Senator of the United States from the State of Connecticut be referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, who shall be instructed to inquire into the election, return, and qualification of the said John M. Niles, and into his capacity at this time to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States."

On motion by Mr. Jarnagin,

Ordered, That the said committee be appointed by the President pro tempore;

And Mr. Jarnagin, Mr. Benton, Mr. Berrien, Mr. Wright, and Mr. McDuffie were appointed.

THURSDAY, May 16, 1844.

Mr. Jarnagin, from the select committee to whom the credentials of the Hon. John M. Niles were referred, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. John M. Niles be permitted to take the oath of a Senator in the Congress of the United States, and to take his seat as a member of the Senate."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and having agreed thereto,

The oath prescribed by law was administered to the Hon. John M. Niles, and he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, MAY 16, 1844.

Mr. Jarnagin made the following report:

The select committee, to whom was referred the credentials of the Hon. John M. Niles, to be a Senator of the United States from the State of Connecticut, with instructions to inquire into the election, return, and qualifications of the said John M. Niles, and into his capacity at this time to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, have performed the duty assigned and present the following report:

In the month of May, 1842, the Hon. John M. Niles was duly elected a Senator from the State of Connecticut in the Congress of the United States for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1843. The committee are satisfied his election, return, and qualifications are legal and sufficient, and that it remains to inquire into his capacity at this time to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution. In prosecuting this inquiry the committee addressed a note to Mr. Niles requesting an interview with him, which was promptly given. Between him and the committee there have been full, free, and frank conversations. Mr. Niles gave so satisfactory an account of his afflictions and present condition as to render a resort to other evidence unnecessary in the opinion of the committee. He has long been laboring under severe bodily afflictions, which, as was natural, impaired the energies of his mind to such an extent that it was deemed proper to remove him to a retreat at Utica, in the State of New York, of which he remained an inmate till about the 1st of April, 1844. His visitations were greatly alleviated, but he felt he had not physical ability to discharge the duties of a Senator for some time after the commencement of the present session of Congress, and a strong aversion to being an obstacle in the way of a full representation of his State in the Senate, but his inclinations were yielded to what was thought the better judgment of his friends, in obedience to which he repaired to Washington to take his seat in the Senate about the 1st of April last, but felt unable to do so till the 30th of that month, when he presented himself to be qualified as Senator. As evidence of the propriety of the course pursued, Mr. Niles presented to the committee the following letter of Dr. A. Bingham:

"ASYLUM, UTICA, April 24, 1844.

"Hon. JOHN M. NILES:

"MY DEAR SIR: Your letter has been received and read with much satisfaction. I perceive you are improving, and that it requires but a little more time, warm weather, and exertion on your part, with some urgency of friends, to restore you to health. Though you have been greatly afflicted with sickness, I trust you will call to mind that you have been no more so than thousands of others who have perfectly recovered. To effect your restoration now, my dear sir, requires that you engage in some active duties. You are in the condition that the distinguished Robert Hall was for a while, and to whom his friend Sir James McIntosh, who was educated a physician, gave the following advice, the advice that I give to you now, and urge you to follow it: 'The remedy,' says he, 'in your case is prescribed by the plainest maxims of duty—you must act. Inactive contemplation, or lamentation, is a dangerous condition for minds of profound moral sensibility.' Let me therefore urge you to resume your seat in the Senate as an act of duty and a resource against disease. Such exercise is necessary for your health, and by it you may also serve others.

"Please show this letter to your brother, and perhaps to other friends, to whom I wish to say that a peculiarity of your nature is, even when well (so great is your caution), to require a little urging. I hope, therefore, they will not fail to discharge their duty now in urging you to this course. I hope in a few days to hear you are daily engaged for an hour or two in the Senate"

The committee are satisfied Mr. Niles is at this time laboring under mental and physical debility, but is not of "unsound mind," in the technical sense of that phrase; that the faculties of his mind are under the control of his will; and they see no sufficient reason why he be not qualified and permitted to take his seat as a member of the Senate, and they most cordially unite with Dr. Bingham in the hope that such a course will be the means of usefulness and a resource against disease.

Resolved, That the Hon. John M. Niles be permitted to take the oath of a Senator in the Congress of the United States, and to take his seat as a member of the Senate.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1849.]

JAMES SHIELDS,

Senator from Illinois from March 6, 1849, till March 15, 1849, and from December 3, 1849, till March 3, 1855.

Mr. Shields, an alien by birth, was elected to the Senate January 13, 1849, for the term of six years from the 3d of March following. March 6 the oath was administered to him, and his credentials referred to a select committee. The committee reported that it appeared that he was naturalized on the 21st day October, 1840, and reported the resolution "that the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States." The resolution was amended by adding to it the words "at the commencement of the term for which he was elected," and passed March 15. Mr. Shields was afterward elected for the same term.

FRIDAY, March 2, 1849.

Mr. Douglas presented the credentials of the Hon. James Shields, chosen a Senator by the general assembly of the State of Illinois for and during the term of six years from and after the 4th day of March, A. D. 1849; which were read.

MONDAY, March 5, 1849.

The Hon. James Shields, whose credentials were read the 2d of March, appearing for the purpose of being qualified,

Mr. Walker submitted the following resolution; which was read:

"Resolved, That the certificate of election of the Hon. James Shields to a seat in this body be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the eligibility of the said James Shields to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a member thereof."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution by unanimous consent.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 6, 1849.

On motion by Mr. Douglas, the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Shields.

[On Mr. Douglas's motion a debate ensued on the question whether Mr. Shields's credentials were such prima facie evidence of the necessary qualifications to a seat in the Senate as entitled him to be at once sworn, or whether they should be first referred to a committee; which debate is found on pages 327–329 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Walker in relation to the credentials of the Hon. James Shields; and, having been amended, it was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the certificate of the election of the Hon. James Shields to a seat in this body be referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, with instructions to inquire into the eligibility of the said James Shields to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a member thereof."

[On this amended resolution, offered by Mr. Butler, some remarks were made on the question whether the case should more properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to a select committee, which remarks are found on page 330 of the Congressional Globe before referred to.]

WEDNESDAY, March 7, 1849.

Resolved, That the standing and select committees for the present special session of the Senate be constituted and appointed as follows, viz:

* * * * * * *

Select committee on the eligibility of the Hon. James Shields as a Senator—Mr. Benton, Mr. Felch, Mr. Webster, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Pearce.

THURSDAY, March 8, 1849.

Mr. Walker submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the select committee to inquire into the eligibility of the Hon. James Shields to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a member thereof be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to call to their aid a person authorized to administer oaths, and to take the testimony of such persons as the committee may deem proper, and to procure the proper authentication of any papers or records which the committee may at any time have before it relating to the subject-matter under its consideration."

Mr. Walker presented a copy of the record of naturalization in the case of the Hon. James Shields; which was referred to the said select committee.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

TUESDAY, March 13, 1849.

Mr. Mason submitted the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred the certificate of election of the Hon. James Shields to a seat in this body, with instructions to inquire into the eligibility of the said James Shields to such seat, report—

That having given due notice to the said James Shields, he appeared before them, and they took the subject into consideration.

They further report that the said certificate of election declares that the said James Shields was chosen a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Illinois on the 13th day of January last; that it further appears, and is admitted by the said James Shields, that he is an alien by birth, and the only proof before the committee of the naturalization of the said James Shields in the United States is contained in the copy of a certificate of naturalization in the circuit court of Effingham County, in the said State of Illinois, which is annexed to and made part of this report; by which certificate it appears that the said James Shields was admitted by said court a citizen of the United States on the 21st day of October, 1840.

The committee therefore report the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States."

Ex parte James Shields.

This day personally appeared in open court James Shields, and made and filed the following declaration:

James Shields, being duly sworn in open court, declares on oath that he was born in the county of Tyrone, in the kingdom of Ireland, on the 17th day of May, about the year 1810; that he emigrated to the United States of America while a minor, and continued to reside in the United States three years next preceding his arriving at the age of twenty-one years, and has continued to reside therein since to the present time; he is now upwards of twenty-one years of age, and has resided upwards of five years within the State of Illinois aforesaid, one of the United States; that it is his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and particularly to the Sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland; and he further declares that for three years next preceding the present application it has been his bona fide intention to become a citizen of the United States.

JAMES SHIELDS.

Subscribed and sworn to in open court, this 21st day of October, 1840.

WILLIAM H. BLAKELY,
Clerk of said Court.

This day personally appeared in open court James Shields, a free white person, upwards of twenty-one years of age, and applied to be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, and who, being duly sworn, declares on oath, in open court, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatsoever, and particularly of the Sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland, whereof he was born a subject; and the court being satisfied that he has fully complied with the requirements of the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, and that he has resided within the United States upwards of five years and within the State of Illinois upwards of one year next preceding this application, and that during the whole of the time of his residence in the United States he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same, it is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said James Shields be admitted a citizen of the United States, and that he is hereby admitted as such.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
Effingham County, ss:

I, John S. Kelly, clerk of the circuit court in and for said county, certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the record of naturalization in the case of James Shields, entered, as appears upon the record, on the 21st day of October, A. D. 1840.

Given under my hand and private seal (there being no official seal yet provided for said court at Effington) this 31st day of January, A. D. 1841.

[SEAL.] JOHN S. KELLY, Clerk.

[Mr. Mason, when he presented the report, made a statement that a communication in writing to the committee from General Shields had, owing to some inadvertence, never reached them, but that he had since seen it, and that it might be seen by Senators; which statement is found on page 332 of the Congressional Globe referred to.]

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. Foote moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until the first Monday in December next.*

[The debates on the adoption of the resolution and on Mr. Foote's motion are found on pages 333–336 of the Congressional Globe.]

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1849.

The Senate having before it the motion made yesterday, to postpone until the first Monday in December next the resolution in relation to the election of James Shields, a debate ensued, after which Mr. Foote withdrew the motion.†

[The debate on this motion is found on pages 337, 338 of the Congressional Globe.]

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the select committee in relation to the election of James Shields; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Cass that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 34.

On motion by Mr. Cass, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bradbury, Cass, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Fitzpatrick, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Jones, Rusk, Soulé, Sturgeon, Turney, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Chase, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dawson, Felch, Greene, Hunter, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Phelps, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, Wales, Walker, Webster, and Whitcomb.

On motion by Mr. Calhoun to amend the resolution by adding thereto "at the commencement of the term for which he was elected,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Hale that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 23.

[The debates on the last two motions are found on pages 338–342 of the Congressional Globe. They include a discussion of the question whether the election of General Shields was void or voidable, and whether, in case the resolution as amended should pass the Senate, the governor of Illinois would have power to fill the vacancy by appointment.]

On motion by Mr. Douglas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Borland, Bradbury, Butler, Cass, Chase, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzpatrick, Foote, Hale, Hunter, Jones, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Soulé, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Bright, Calhoun, Clarke, Cooper, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dawson, Dickinson, Greene, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Smith, Spruance, Upham, Wales, Walker, Webster, and Whitcomb.

*This motion is taken from the Congressional Globe. It does not appear in the Journal.
†This proceeding is taken from the Congressional Globe. It does not appear in the Journal.

The Hon. James Shields having handed to the Vice-President a letter tendering his resignation,

Mr. Hale called for the reading of the letter, and, no objection being made, the letter was read.

Mr. Hale submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Vice-President be requested to inform the executive of the State of Illinois that the Hon. James Shields has this day resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States."

On motion by Mr. Berrien,

Ordered, That the consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, March 15, 1849.

On motion by Mr. Turney that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Hale the 14th instant, requesting the Vice-President to inform the executive of the State of Illinois that James Shields has this day resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States,

After debate [a debate on the question whether the resolution offered by Mr. Hale or the resolution reported by the committee should be first considered is found on pages 342–346 of the Congressional Globe],

On motion by Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, that the motion lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 14.*

On motion by Mr. Douglas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clark, Cooper, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dawson, Dickinson, Greene, Hamlin, Hunter, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sturgeon, Upham, Wales, Walker, Webster, Whitcomb, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Cass, Chase, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hale, Jones, Norris, Rusk, Soulé, Turney, and Underwood.

On motion by Mr. Mason, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the select committee in relation to the election of James Shields, and,

After debate [the debate is found on pages 346, 347 of the Globe],

On motion of Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, that it lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 32.†

On motion by Mr. Turney, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Cass, Chase, Davis of Mississippi, Douglas, Downs, Fitzpatrick, Foote, Hale, Jones, Norris, Rusk, Soulé, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Cooper, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawson, Dickinson, Felch, Greene, Hamlin, Hunter, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Phelps, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Upham, Wales, Walker, Webster, and Whitcomb.

[A further debate on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee is found on pages 347–351 of the Globe.]

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Calhoun the 14th instant, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Underwood further to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "was void," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "does not entitle him to a seat as such in this body," it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. Underwood, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Atchison, Bradbury, Chase, Davis of Mississippi, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fitzpatrick, Foote, Jones, Norris, Rusk, Soulé, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Cooper, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawson, Dickinson, Greene, Hamlin, Hunter, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Phelps, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Upham, Wales, and Webster.

On motion by Mr. Douglas to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"That the Vice-President be requested to notify the executive of the State of Illinois that the Hon. James Shields has resigned his seat in this body,"

It was determined in the negative- yeas 12, nays 32.

---

* The Congressional Globe gives this vote yeas 20, nays 15.

† The Congressional Globe gives this vote yeas 18, nays 32.

On motion by Mr. Douglas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Cass, Chase, Douglas, Downs, Fitzpatrick, Foote, Jones, Rusk, Soulé, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Cooper, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Mississippi, Dawson, Dickinson, Greene, Hamlin, Hunter, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Phelps, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Upham, Wales, Walker, and Webster.

No further amendment being proposed, the resolution was then agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

On motion by Mr. Webster,

Ordered, That the Vice-President be requested to transmit to the governor of the State of Illinois a copy of the said resolution, attested by the Secretary of the Senate.

[Thirty-second Congress—First session.]

YULEE vs. MALLORY, of Florida.

January 13, 1851, the general assembly of Florida met in convention to elect a Senator for the term beginning March 4, 1851. A viva voce vote being taken pursuant to the requirements of the constitution of the State, 29 members responded David L. Yulee and 29 responded blank, whereupon the presiding officer declared that there had been no election. January 15 they again met in convention, when 31 members responded R. S. Mallory and 27 voted for Mr. Yulee and others, whereupon the presiding officer declared Mr. Mallory to be duly elected. Neither party appeared to take the seat during the special session of the Senate in March, 1851. March 8 a letter from Mr. Yulee was read stating that he should contest the seat of Mr. Mallory, declared to be elected. December 1, 1851, the credentials of Mr. Mallory were presented and he took the oath. On the same day the letter of Mr. Yulee with accompanying documents was referred to a select committee of five. August 21, 1852, the committee reported that there was in force in that State, at the time of the election, the following resolution: "Resolved, That a majority of all the members-elect composing the two houses of the general assembly shall be necessary to determine all elections devolving upon that body"; that this resolution was joint in fact, though not in form, and was sufficient, though without the forms of law usual in legislation, to regulate the "manner of holding elections"; that the whole number of members-elect in this general assembly was 59, and that Mr. Yulee receiving but 29 votes on the first ballot, did not obtain a sufficient number to elect him; that they recommend the adoption of the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory was duly elected a member of the Senate of the United States from the 3d day of March, 1851." The resolution passed the Senate August 27, without a dissenting vote.

Mr. Yulee's claim to the seat was on the ground that the resolution of the legislature of Florida given above was not such legislation as is requisite in order to change the law of a State, and that the law in Florida had always been that the majority of a quroum of the members composing the legislature could elect, and was at that time the law; that the votes of the 29 voting blank should not be counted at all, and that he being the only qualified person voted for, and receiving 29 votes, had a majority of the legal votes, and more than a majority of a quorum, which majority was 16.

The history of the case here given consists of the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 32d Cong., vol. 2, 1851–'52, Report No. 349; a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to the case on August 27, 1852 (being the day on which the case was discussed in the Senate), from the Senate Journal, 1st sess. 32d Cong., 1851–'52; and a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to the payment of mileage and per diem to Mr. Yulee from Senate Journals, 1st and 2d sess. 32d Cong.

The debates in the case are found on pages 1170–1176 of the Appendix to Congressional Globe, vol. 25, 1st sess. 32d Cong., 1851–'52. A reference to the debates on the question of payment to Mr. Yulee is inserted below. The documents accompanying the case which were printed are found in Senate Miscellaneous, 1st sess. 32d Cong., 1851–'52, Nos. 109 and 110.

The minor proceedings of the Senate relating to the case previous to the day of its discussion in the Senate have been omitted in making up the history of this case.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Committee appointed December 2, 1851.—Messrs. Berrien*, Bright, Davis, Mason, and Pearce.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

AUGUST 21, 1852.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Bright made the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Hon. David L. Yulee, claiming the seat in the Senate held by the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory, from the State of Florida, together with sundry documents therewith, report:

That they have examined the law and the facts connected with this case, they have heard the contestant by able counsel, and the sitting member in person, and after giving to each that consideration which the importance of the questions embraced merits, find that on the 13th day of January, 1851, the general assembly of Florida met in convention of the two houses to choose a Senator of the United States to supply a vacancy which would occur before another constitutional session.

The president of the senate presided, and upon a call of the roll a poll viva voce was taken of the members pursuant to the requirements of the constitution of the State, and 29 responded David L. Yulee and 29 blank, whereupon the presiding officer declared that no choice had been made; they then proceeded to a second and third vote, with substantially the same result. On the 15th of January they again met in convention for the same purpose, and upon a call of the roll 31 members responded R. S. Mallory, and 27 votes for Mr. Yulee and others; whereupon the president declared Mr. Mallory to be duly elected.

* February 2, 1852, Mr. Berrien resigned and Mr. Badger was appointed in his place February 3.

Neither the record nor any other evidence in the case shows that objection was made to any of those proceedings, or that their legality was questioned in or out of the convention at the time.

The certificate of election was granted to Mr. Mallory, and he having been qualified, now holds the seat.

Mr. Yulee contests his right to the seat on the ground that he was himself elected at the first vote, because there was a quorum of each house present as appears by the journals, and he, being the only qualified person voted for, had a majority of the legal votes. Those who responded "blank," he contends, voted for no qualified person, and waived their electoral rights as effectually as if they had been silent.

Mr. Mallory opposes to this inference a resolution of the two houses adopted in 1845, by concurrent vote, which has never been rescinded, and is in the following words:

"Resolved, That a majority of all the members-elect composing the two houses of general assembly shall be necessary to determine all elections devolving upon that body."

The whole number of members-elect was 59, and Mr. Yulee, not having a majority of that number, was not elected. From the facts disclosed it is quite apparent that the convention took this view of the matter.

In deciding the questions which are raised out of the facts, the Constitution of the United States must, to the extent of its provisions, prevail over all other authority. That instrument gives to each State the right to elect two Senators. Article I, section 4, is in these words: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof."

The words of the third section in the same article are: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years."

The first question, then, which arises is, What constitutes the legislature of Florida? For that, and that only, has the right to make the choice. The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 1, says: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The constitution of Florida declares that "the legislative power of the State shall be vested in two distinct branches, the one to be styled the senate, the other the house of representatives, both together the general assembly." These authorities leave no doubt that the two houses constitute the legislature of Florida, which holds the unqualified right under the Constitution of the United States to elect the Senators for the State.

Has this body executed the trust confided to it in such a manner as to satisfy the terms of the Constitution? The time, the place, and the manner of holding the election are all to be prescribed by it. To the time and place no objection is made, but the validity of the manner is questioned.

No mode of election is prescribed by the Constitution, but this duty is left to the discretion of the several legislatures of the States. In carrying out the power some elect by a concurrent vote of the two branches, the one having a negative upon the action of the other; others elect in a convention of the two houses, in which case (as far as your committee are advised) a majority prevails.

If numbers be regarded as a material element in such elections, it is manifest that in the same body of men different results may be produced according as one mode or the other is pursued. There may be in convention a majority in favor of a candidate, making his success by this mode certain, while with the same number in his favor he might be defeated in one of the houses if a concurrent vote is required; and such cases have occurred.

Again, it may be observed that the power given to the legislature to regulate the time, place, and manner applies as well to Representatives as to Senators; and here again are other diversities in the manner of exercising it. Some States elect by a plurality of votes, others by a majority, and others have required at the first trial a majority and a plurality afterward. Some again (until Congress made a law upon the subject) elected by general ticket; others, either by single districts or districts entitled to more than one, according to convenience. None of those modes of electing Senators or Representatives has been held unconstitutional, but members have uniformly been admitted to their seats whether elected in one or other of these modes.

These practices have at all times existed, and have uniformly been recognized as constitutional, proving clearly that the discretion reposed in the legislatures of the States may be exercised in a diversity of ways and yet be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Constitution.

The legislature of Florida adopted a course different from any of these by requiring a majority of all the members-elect in convention to make choice of a Senator. This rule is as unobjectionable and harmonizes as well with the Constitution as the modes pursued elsewhere. The right of the State to adopt such a rule has not been directly questioned, but the legality of the means by which it was executed is denied. This point is the chief ground of controversy between the parties. On the one hand, the validity of the resolution above cited is denied; on the other, it is alleged that if the resolution was not in force a usage equivalent to it existed, which was equally obligatory upon the convention. This again is denied.

We will first consider the character, force, and effect of the resolution.

The first objection to it is that it contains no evidence on its face that it is a joint act of the two houses. This is true; but the journals place this matter in the clearest light. While there is an apparent defect in form there was none in fact. It was passed in one house, sent to the other, and there agreed to by a concurrent vote; it is a clear, unequivocal expression of the will of each house. No words added to it can make it a stronger or more complete expression of that will. It is also in substance joint, since it is the will of both houses expressed in the same words. Moreover it is permanent, being designed as a rule of action for both, by the united will of both, and it must stand as such until both concur in repealing or rescinding it.

The next objection is that it has not the forms of law usual in legislation, because it is not signed by the officers of each house or approved by the governor. It is a sufficient reply to state that the Constitution does not require the legislature to regulate the manner of election by law; it may be by resolution, either joint or several, or in any other method which commands the agreement of both houses of the legislature. The form of action being discretionary and the substance right, the objection becomes immaterial.

The will of the two houses, when ascertained by vote in their respective chambers, is for this purpose a sufficient law, because they alone are empowered to prescribe the manner of choosing in such mode or by such means as they please. On this point a State constitution can neither control nor modify that of the United States, for the latter is the supreme law.

This resolution being joint in fact, though not in the usual form, was a standing order of the two houses, in force until they by concurrent vote should rescind or modify it. It was consequently the rule prescribing the manner of election to the two houses when they met in convention on the 13th of January, 1851, and they were bound to proceed according to its requirements.

This being the view which the committee take of the case, there is no necessity for pursuing the subject further, since Mr. Yulee did not obtain votes sufficient to elect him. It may not, however, be out of place to observe that the facts disclosed render it evident that the two houses entered the convention with the full belief that no number short of a majority of all the members-elect could make a choice of a Senator, and conducted their proceedings under the conviction that they were bound to adhere to the established practice. There is also reason for believing that the members of the convention assembled and acted under the conviction that blank votes would be counted, inasmuch as the two houses on a former occasion and in another election had so decided. If blank votes are beyond doubt a nullity; if the resolution is to be regarded of no effect, and we are brought to the question, under these circumstances, whether Mr. Yulee is duly elected, it seems to us difficult to maintain the affirmative of that proposition upon the facts before us. If the members were misled on both of these material points by assuming that their previous doings afforded safe and certain rules of action, then they were misguided by what they had a right to consider as authority, and must have acted under a misconception of right which stood, as they supposed, unquestioned. If this be so they stand substantially in the condition of an elector who votes for a person disqualified, believing him to be qualified. The vote in such a case, though unavailing, is not rejected from the count.

The only remedy which we can see for an election carried on through misapprehension from such well-founded causes is to set it wholly aside and open the way to a new choice; but in our view of the case there is no occasion to consider what ought to be done upon such a state of facts.

The committee ought perhaps to notice one other fact which has been relied upon. Since the adoption of the resolution the journals show a case in which a person who was declared not to be elected in convention because he had not the number of votes required was afterward declared elected by a concurrent resolution of the two houses. All that need be said of this transaction is that it passed the senate through the misapprehension of one of its members, as the journal proves, and was manifestly a violation of the resolution. It is equally manifest that the members of both houses did not regard it as affecting in any way the standing order, for its provisions were at all times subsequently observed as obligatory in convention. No argument is necessary to prove that such an irregular proceeding could have no effect upon the order either to modify or rescind it.

With these views the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory was duly elected a member of the Senate of the United States from the 3d day of March, 1851.

[Extract from Senate Journal, August 27, 1852.]

On motion by Mr. Weller that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the select committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Hon David L. Yulee, claiming the seat in the Senate held by the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Weller, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Bradbury, Bright, Brooke, Charlton, Clemens, Dawson, Felch, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Seward, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Badger, Bell, Borland, Brodhead. Clarke, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Hamlin, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Rusk, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Morton the 24th August, to give leave to the Hon. David L. Yulee to be heard in person at the bar of the Senate; and,

On motion by Mr. Weller that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 17, nays 29.

On motion by Mr. Gwin, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Bradbury, Clarke, Clemens, Downs, Fish, Gwin, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Pearce, Rusk, Spruance, Stockton, and Weller.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Borland, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Cass, Charlton, Dawson, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Geyer, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Mangum, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Morton, Seward, Shields, Underwood, Upham, and Wade.

On motion by Mr. Pearce to amend the resolution by adding thereto "for two hours," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Badger, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Cass, Clarke, Clemens, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Fish, Foote, Hale, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Meriwether, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, and Weller.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Borland, Brodhead, Brooke, Charlton, Chase, Cooper, De Saussure, Douglas, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Mangum, Mason, Morton, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Wade.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Morton was then agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. D. L. Yulee, who contests the seat of the Hon. S. R. Mallory, have leave to be heard in person at the bar of the Senate for two hours."

On the question to agree to the resolution reported by the select committee, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory was duly elected a member of the Senate of the United States from the 3d day of March, 1851,"

A motion was made by Mr. Mangum that the further consideration thereof be postponed to the first Tuesday after the second Monday in December next; and it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 37.

On motion by Mr. Bradbury, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Bell, Borland, Brodhead, Cooper, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Hamlin, Mangum, Meriwether, Miller, Morton, and Upham.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bradbury, Bright, Brooke, Butler, Cass, Charlton, Chase, Clarke, Clemens, Davis, Dawson, Felch, Foote, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mason, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Toucey, Underwood, Wade, Walker, and Weller.

Mr. Yulee having addressed the Senate,

On motion, Mr. Morton was excused from voting on the resolution.

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 41.

On motion by Mr. Pratt, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Badger Bayard, Bell, Bradbury, Bright, Brooke, Butler, Cass, Charlton, Clemens, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Fish, Foote, Geyer, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Soulé, Spruance, Sumner, Toucey, Underwood, and Weller.

COMPENSATION OF MR. YULEE.

MONDAY, August 30, 1852.

Mr. Morton submitted the following resolution; which was read:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the Hon. David L. Yulee a sum equal to the amount of mileage and per diem compensation of a Senator from the commencement of the present session to the 27th instant, the day on which the Senate decided that the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory, whose seat in the Senate was claimed by him, was duly elected a member of the Senate from the State of Florida."

TUESDAY, August 31, 1852.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Morton the 30th instant, directing a payment to the Hon. David L. Yulee from the contingent fund; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Morton,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

[Some remarks against the passage of this resolution are found on page 2488 of the Congressional Globe, vol. 24, part 3, 1st sess. 32d Cong., 1851–'52.]

FRIDAY, February 25, 1853.

Mr. Morton submitted the following resolution; which was read. [Resolution given above.]

MONDAY, March 7, 1853.

Mr. Morton submitted the following resolution; which was read. [Resolution given above.]

THURSDAY, March 17, 1853.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Morton the 7th instant, to allow per diem and mileage to the Hon. David L. Yulee during the time he contested the seat of the Hon. Mr. Mallory in the Senate, and on the question, "Shall the resolution pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 19.

On motion by Mr. Houston, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Badger, Borland, Brodhead, Butler, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Everett, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Morton, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Soulé, Sumner, and Walker.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Atherton, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Chase, Geyer, Hamlin, Houston, Norris, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thompson of New Jersey, Weller, and Wright.

[Thirty-fourth Congress—First session.]

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

Senator from Illinois from March 4, 1855, to March 3, 1873.

June 7, 1852, Mr. Trumbull was elected a judge of the supreme court of Illinois for a term of nine years, and was duly commissioned June 24. May 19, 1853, he resigned this office, to take effect July 4, 1853. February 8, 1855, he was elected to the Senate of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1855. The constitution of Illinois provided that the judges of the supreme court should not be eligible to any office of public trust or profit in the United States during the term for which they were elected, nor for one year thereafter; and that all votes for them, for any elective office, given by the general assembly, should be void. When Mr. Trumbull's credentials were presented in the Senate, a protest of members of the legislature was presented, protesting against the legality of the election on the ground that it was void by virtue of the provision of the constitution referred to. The subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who reported that there was such a division of opinion as to render it proper to refer the subject to the Senate, and asked to be excused, which report was accepted by the Senate. A resolution declaring Mr. Trumbull entitled to his seat was then introduced and passed the Senate by a vote of 35 yeas to 8 nays. The arguments show that the Senators voting in favor of the legality of the election did so from different grounds, some proceeding upon the ground that this case did not come within the meaning of the clause of the State constitution referred to, because Mr. Trumbull had resigned the office of judge more than a year before his election to the Senate; and others proceeding upon the ground that a State cannot superadd qualifications of a Senator to those required by the United States Constitution. Extracts from the debates given below will show the lines of the different arguments.

The history of the case here given consists of the report of the committee taken from Senate Reports, 34th Cong., 1st sess. vol. I, 1855–'56, report No. 15; the proceedings of the Senate relating to the case from the Senate Journal, 1st and 2d sess. 34th Cong., 1855–'56; and extracts from the debates found in the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 34th Cong., 1855–'56.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE, CONTAINING THE DOCUMENTS PRINTED IN THE CASE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Butler (chairman), Toucey, Bayard, Geyer, Toombs, and Pugh.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 27, 1856.—Submitted, agreed to, and ordered to be printed with the protest and other papers.

Mr. Butler made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the "Protest of certain senators and representatives of the legislature of the State of Illinois against the election of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull as a Senator of the United States," and other papers, report:

That it has been under consideration and discussion by the committee, and there being such a division of opinion as to render it proper, in their judgment, to refer the subject to the Senate, ask to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Certified copy of the resignation of Lyman Trumbull of the office of justice of the supreme court of the State of Illinois.

ALTON, May 19, 1853.

SIR: I am induced, by considerations of a personal and private character, to resign the office of justice of the supreme court; but to allow time for the election of a person to succeed me, so that no public inconvenience may result from a vacancy on the bench, I hereby tender my resignation of said office, to take effect on the 4th day of July next.

Yours, very respectfully,

LYMAN TRUMBULL.

His excellency JOEL A. MATTESON,
Governor of Illinois.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Illinois, ss:

I, Alexander Starne, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of Lyman Trumbull's resignation, filed in the secretary's office, May 20, 1853.

And I further certify that Walter B. Scates was elected to fill said vacancy, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of said office, July 13, 1853.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of State, this 9th day of November, A. D. 1855.

[L. S.]

ALEXANDER STARNE,
Secretary of State.

Certificate of Joel A. Matteson, governor of the State of Illinois, relative to the election of Lyman Trumbull to be a Senator of the United States, and also to the office of justice of the supreme court of that State.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF ILLINOIS,
November 1, 1855.

I, Joel A. Matteson, governor of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that it appears of record that on the 8th day of February, A. D. 1855, the two houses of the legislature of the State of Illinois met in convention and proceeded to vote for the election of a Senator for said State to the Senate of the United States; that upon the final vote Lyman Trumbull received 51 votes, Joel A. Matteson received 47 votes, and Archibald Williams received 1 vote; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives thereupon declared Lyman Trumbull elected a Senator of the United States for the State of Illinois for six years from the 4th day of March, A. D. 1855.

That it further appears from record that the said Lyman Trumbull was elected, on the 7th day of June, A. D. 1852, a justice of the supreme court of the State of Illinois for a term of nine years; that on the 24th day of June, A. D. 1852, he was duly commissioned as justice for the term aforesaid, commencing on the first Monday of June, A. D. 1852, and ending on the first Monday of June, A. D. 1861; that he was sworn and entered upon the discharge of his duties appertaining to said office; that the constitution of the State of Illinois contains the following provision, to wit:

"The judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall not be eligible to any other office of public trust or profit, in this State or the United States, during the term for which they are elected, nor for one year thereafter; all votes for either of them, for any elective office (except that of judge of the supreme or circuit court) given by the general assembly or people, shall be void."

All of which, together with the legality of said election, are respectfully submitted to the Senate of the United States.

J. A. MATTESON.

By the governor:
[L. S.]

ALEXANDER STARNE,
Secretary of State.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE of the United States.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Illinois, ss:

I, Alexander Starne, secretary of state for the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that Lyman Trumbull was, on the seventh day of June, A. D. 1852, elected judge of the supreme court of the State of Illinois, and was duly commissioned as such for the term of nine years from the 24th day of June, 1852; that he took upon himself the oath of office, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the same; that said term of office for which he was elected is unexpired, and will not expire until the 27th day of June, 1861.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1855.

[L. S.]

ALEXANDER STARNE,
Secretary of State.

Protest of certain senators and representatives of the legislature of the State of Illinois against the election of Lyman Trumbull as a Senator of the United States.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, senators and representatives of the people of the State of Illinois in the legislature thereof, respectfully represent: That at a meeting of both houses of said legislature, in general assembly convened, on the 8th day of February, 1855, for the purpose of electing a Senator for said State to the Senate of the United States for six years from the 4th of March, 1855, 51 votes were cast for Lyman Trumbull, 47 votes for Joel A. Matteson, and 1 vote for Archibald Williams, and that one member of said legislature was absent.

They further represent that the constitution of the State of Illinois contains the following provision in the tenth section of the fourth article thereof:

"The judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall not be eligible to any other office or public trust of profit in this State, or the United States, during the term for which they are elected, nor for one year thereafter; all votes for either of them, for any elective office, except that of judge of the supreme or circuit courts, given by the general assembly or the people, shall be void."

They further represent that said Lyman Trumbull was, on the 7th day of June, 1852, elected judge of the supreme court of the State of Illinois, and was duly commissioned as such, for the term of nine years, from the 24th day of June, 1852; that he took upon himself the oath of said office, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the same; that his said term of office for which he was elected is unexpired, and will not expire until the 27th day of June, 1861; and that in and by virtue of the said provision of the constitution of the said State of Illinois, the votes cast by the members of the general assembly for said Trumbull for Senator of said State, as aforesaid, are null and void, and said Trumbull is not legally elected to the Senate of the United States, and is not entitled to his seat in said Senate; and against said pretended election the undersigned, in behalf of themselves and their constituents, do hereby protest.

Credentials of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Illinois.

It is hereby certified that, in pursuance of a joint resolution to that effect adopted, the two houses of the general assembly of the State of Illinois, now in session at Springfield in said State, did convene in joint session in the hall of the house of representatives on the eighth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, for the purpose of electing a Senator to the Congress of the United States for the term of six years from the fourth day of March, in the year aforesaid, and that Lyman Trumbull was then and there, by said joint session of the legislature of said State, duly elected Senator to represent the State of Illinois in the Senate of the United States for six years from the said fourth day of March next.

Dated at Springfield the ninth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five.

Attest:

GEORGE T. BROWN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Attest:

EDWIN T. BRIDGES,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

THOMAS G. TURNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives and Presiding Officer of the said joint session.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Illinois, ss:

I, Alexander Starne, secretary of state for the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a certificate of the election of Lyman Trumbull to the United States Senate, as filed in my office by the clerk of the house of representatives.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State, this 15th day of February, A. D. 1855.

[L. S.]

ALEXANDER STARNE,
Secretary of State.

MONDAY, December 3, 1855.

Mr. Crittenden presented the credentials of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull, elected a Senator by the general assembly of the State of Illinois for six years from the 4th day of March, 1855; which were read.

Mr. Cass presented the protest of certain senators and representatives of the legislature of the State of Illinois against the election of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull.

The oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Trumbull, and he took his seat in the Senate.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1855.

Mr. Trumbull presented a certified copy of a letter of Lyman Trumbull, addressed to the governor of Illinois, resigning the office of justice of the supreme court of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. Cass,

Ordered, That the protest of certain senators and representatives of the legislature of Illinois against the election of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull as a Senator of the United States, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[Some remarks on the question whether the subject should go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to a select committee are found on page 58 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

MONDAY, February 4, 1856.

The President pro tempore presented a certificate of the governor of Illinois of the election of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull by the legislature of that State as a Senator in Congress, and of his election and appointment as a justice of the supreme court of Illinois, with an extract from the constitution of Illinois respecting the eligibility of judges of the courts of that State to other offices during the term for which they are appointed; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[Some remarks on the question of reference of the communication are found on page 343 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. Mr. Seward cited the admission of Hon. N. P. Tallmadge, of New York, as a precedent in favor of the right of Mr. Trumbull.]

WEDNESDAY, February 20, 1856.

[Some remarks made on Mr. Trumbull's eligibility are found on pages 466–468 of the Congressional Globe referred to.]

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1856.

Mr. Butler, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the protest of certain senators and representatives of the legislature of Illinois against the election of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull as a Senator of the United States, with other papers, submitted a report (No. 15).

The Senate proceeded to consider the report; and, in concurrence therewith, Ordered, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Ordered, That the report, with the accompanying papers, be printed.

Mr. Crittenden submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Lyman Trumbull is entitled to a seat in this body as a Senator elected by the legislature of the State of Illinois, for the term of six years, from the 4th of March, 1855."

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and,

On motion by Mr. Stuart,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Monday, the 3d of March next.

MONDAY, March 3, 1856.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Crittenden, the 27th of February, declaring the Hon. Lyman Trumbull entitled to a seat as a Senator of the United States; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Stuart,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

[The subject is debated at length on pages 547–552 of the Congressional Globe referred to.]

TUESDAY, March 4, 1856.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Crittenden, the 27th of February, that the Hon. Lyman Trumbull is entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Weller,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 5, 1856.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Crittenden, the 27th of February, in relation to the rights of the Hon. Lyman Trumbull to a seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 8.

On motion by Mr. Toucey, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Adams, Allen, Bell of Tennessee, Bright, Brown, Butler, Cass, Collamer, Crittenden, Dodge, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Foster, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, James, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Sumner, Toucey, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Clay, Iverson, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Pugh, Slidell, Stuart, and Weller.

So it was

Resolved, That Lyman Trumbull is entitled to a seat in this body as a Senator elected by the legislature of the State of Illinois for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1855.

[The debate is concluded on pages 579–584 of the Congressional Globe referred to.]

[Extracts from a speech of Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, delivered March 3, 1856, in support of the legality of Mr. Trumbull's election, taken from pages 547 and 548 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"The facts of the case are few and undisputed. Mr. Trumbull was, in point of fact, chosen by the legislature of Illinois as a Senator in this body. It is true that some four years before that time he had been elected a judge of one of the circuit courts of that State, but it is also true that he had resigned that office about eighteen months before his election as a Senator. The first question, therefore, that presents itself is, whether upon these facts, and a proper construction of the constitution of the State of Illinois, he is entitled to his seat? No objection is made to any qualification required by the Constitution of the United States. The question is, whether there is anything in the constitution of Illinois which can invalidate his election. I will first consider the question as it arises upon the constitution of Illinois, and then as respects the Constitution of the United States. The provision of the constitution of Illinois I desire to read to the Senate. The tenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of that State reads in these words:

"'The judges of the supreme court shall receive a salary of $1,200 per annum, payable quarterly, and no more. The judges of the circuit courts shall receive a salary of $1,000 per annum, payable quarterly, and no more. The judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall not be eligible to any other office or public trust, of profit in this State, or the United States, during the term for which they are elected, nor for one year thereafter. All votes for either of them for any elective office (except that of judge of the supreme or circuit court) given by the general assembly, or the people, shall be void.'

"Mr. Trumbull was elected on the 7th of June, 1852, judge of the circuit court for the term of nine years. Having held that office less than one year, he resigned on the 19th of May, 1853, to take effect on the ensuing 4th of July. He was elected to the Senate of the United States on the 8th of February, 1855, more than eighteen months after his resignation, but before the expiration of the nine years for which he had been originally elected a judge.

"To these facts we are to apply the constitutional provision which I have read, which declares that no judge of the supreme court or circuit court should be eligible to any other office for the term for which he was elected, and for one year thereafter. Does this prohibition in the constitution of Illinois apply to such a case as this? I say that it does not. In order to ascertain the meaning of any instrument, we must endeavor to ascertain the intention of its framers. What was the intention of the framers of this provision? It was to preserve the independence of their judiciary, and to prevent the possibility of one of the judges of the State using the influence of that office to obtain another. That is the reason and the sole reason for this prohibition; and to accomplish this object, the constitution of Illinois provides not only for ineligibility during the term of nine years, but for one year thereafter, lest he should, by anticipated contrivances, intrigues, and influence, provide for another office by the use of the influence which his present office affords. One year after the expiration of his office was supposed to be sufficient for that purpose.

"Now, sir, suppose I am wrong; suppose that, without any reason, without any motive, without any mischief to be suppressed, without any foundation for any of the objections applicable to the incumbent of office, this constitution shall, by the force of its mere letter, be applied to this case, and that it does create, so far as it can act, an impediment, an obstacle to the election of this gentleman, is such a provision valid, or can it affect his right, when we look to the Constitution of the United States under which the Senate has been created? I think clearly not. We are to look to the Constitution of the United States for the whole frame of this Government. It has created all the powers and all the instruments of this Government. It has created the Senate. Before this creation, neither the State of Illinois as such, nor any other State in the Union, had any power to elect a Senator. There was no such office to be filled by them as Senator of the United States. Their agency was simply employed by the Federal Constitution. The agency of the legislatures of the several States was employed to elect Senators who constitute this body. It is an all-important branch of the Government. The designation of the power that was to elect, the designation of the persons qualified to be elected, all entered into the very essence of the subject. All this was to have its influence on this Government. All and every single circumstance of this was to have its influence in connecting the State governments and the General Government, and in connecting them in such a way as to preserve that species of political relations between them which it was thought would operate most advantageously to all.

"This was the view of the framers of the Constitution of the United States. It was a subject for them whether the legislature should elect Senators, whether the people should elect them, or whether the governors of the several States should appoint them. All this was within the competency of the framers of the Constitution. Neither people, nor governors, nor legislatures had previously any power to elect or appoint a Senator. There was no such officer; there was no such power. The whole was a new creation. The Constitution determines that the power to choose Senators shall be in the legislatures of the several States. The power to elect Senators was committed to the legislatures. Who shall they be, was the next question. The question was, how to designate a Senator by some prescribed qualification, so as to fix the class from which he should come. Shall he be a man who is required to possess any particular amount of fortune? Shall he be a man who must be subjected to some religious test? Of what age shall he be?

"Were not all these points fairly presented to the framers of the Constitution of the United States? Were they not important questions to be acted upon and decided? They were framing the Government. The constitution of this body was an essential part of the Government. That was to depend on the parties, or the condition of the parties, out of whom they would make this great council of the nation. Should he be a citizen? Might they select him anywhere? Should he be an inhabitant of his State? Might he be of any age?

"All these subjects being considered, the Constitution of the United States decides upon the whole matter by providing that each Senator shall be of the age of thirty years, shall have been at least nine years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant of the State from which he is chosen.

"Now, sir, does this not embrace the whole subject? Does it not regulate the whole subject? According to the plain meaning of the Federal Constitution every inhabitant of a State, thirty years of age, who has been nine years a citizen of the United States, is eligible to the office of Senator. What more can be said about it? It is now supposed by those who contend that Mr. Trumbull is not entitled to his seat, that it is competent for a State, by its constitution—and I suppose they would equally contend by any law which the legislature might from time to time pass—to superadd additional qualifications. The Constitution of the United States, they say, has only in part regulated the subject, and therefore it is no interference with that Constitution to make additional regulations. This, I think it will be plain to all, is a mere sophism, when you come to consider it. If it was a power within the regulation of, and proper to be regulated by, the Constitution of the United States, and if that Constitution has qualified it, as I have stated, prescribing the age, prescribing the residence, prescribing the citizenship, was there anything more intended? If so, the framers of the Constitution would have said so. The very enumeration of these qualifications excludes the idea that they intended any other qualifications. That is the plain rule of ordinary construction; but, for a reason above all technical considerations, it is applicable here. The object of the Federal Constitution was to have a body framed by a uniform rule throughout the United States, coming here to constitute this great council of the country—coming here by the agency of the same elective power, the State legislatures—coming here under the same requirements, and with the same qualifications—and standing here upon a perfect and exact equality in all respects to represent the nation justly and equally, and with a sole regard to the common welfare of the Republic."

[Extract from a speech of Mr. Pugh, of Ohio, adverse to the right of Mr. Trumbull, delivered March 3, 1856, taken from pages 549, 550 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"The Senator from Kentucky claims, in Mr. Trumbull's behalf, that the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the qualifications requisite for a Senator, and that no State can add to or subtract from those qualifications.

"I am not disposed to try the virtue of this conclusion by logical tests; I deny the truth of its premises. The Constitution of the United States does not prescribe the qualifications of a Senator in the sense here assumed. Its language is that of exclusion, and not of qualification:

"'No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.'

"In this instance, as in all others, the language of the Constitution was aptly selected with a view to the nature of our Federal Government. It was intended that each Senator should be thirty years of age, and should have been nine years a citizen of the United States, because the duties of his office were thought to require an experienced judgment and considerable familiarity with the course of public affairs. And to secure the election of Senators from all extraneous influence, such as might have been apprehended perhaps from the dictation of the large States or the patronage of the Federal Government, it was furthermore declared that each Senator should not merely be a citizen but an actual resident—'inhabitant'—of the State for which he is chosen.

"I agree that no State can dispense with or subtract from the requisites prescribed in the Federal Constitution; but I can see no pretense for asserting that the States may not superadd any qualification which is consistent with those requisites. A Senator is an officer of the Federal Government; he is also an officer of his own State. He is elected to represent the people of the State, in an aggregate and organized capacity, as one of the sovereign parties to our Federal compact. He is elected, to be sure, by the legislature; but the legislature is itself a body of representatives chosen by the people. His constituency is equal to that of all the members of the legislature taken together. It consists of the people at large acting through counties, districts, or other established subdivisions, and thus expressing the will of the State as a public corporation. While the Federal Constitution might prescribe certain requisites, therefore, in order to secure the interests of the Federal Government, the rights of the citizens of all the States, and the welfare of the whole Union; while it might well do this and bind each State to an observance of such requisites, no reason can be assigned why the people of a State—whose peculiar representative and officer in equal degree their Senator is—might not prescribe other qualifications, in addition, for the purpose of protecting their separate interests, rights, and welfare. I agree, of course, that such additional requisites must not only be consistent with those specified in the Constitution of the United States, but with the whole spirit and tenor of that instrument. No mischief can result to the Union or to other States from this course of decision; and it leaves to the States that degree of independence, that reservation of powers, which the tenth amendment to the Constitution so plainly inculcates.

"There is no conflict between the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Illinois. They are perfectly consistent. Now, so far as my learning extends there is no principle more firmly established in the law of England and of America than this: that whenever two enactments can stand together—whether they be called constitutions, statutes, or by what name soever—they shall stand together, and both shall be obeyed.

"It is suggested, however, that the legislatures of the States derive their power of electing Senators from the Constitution of the United States and not from their respective State constitutions. But this, if admitted to its full extent, will be found immaterial. It is not a power conferred on any legislature as matter of gift or permission from the Federal Government, but as a matter of right, and because the legislature represents the people and acts only as an agent for the people. Surely, I submit, the Constitution of the United States never designed to exalt the agent above the principal, the creature above the creator, the minister above the sovereign, as this proposition assumes."

[Thirty-fourth Congress—Third session.]

JAMES HARLAN,

Senator from Iowa from March 4, 1855, to January 12, 1857, and from January 29, 1857, till May 15, 1865, when he resigned.

December 13, 1854, the legislature of Iowa met in joint convention in the hall of the house of representatives for the purpose of electing a United States Senator for the term beginning March 4, 1855. After several ineffectual ballots and adjournments they met January 5, 1855, and adjourned to 10 o'clock of the next day. After this adjournment of the joint convention the senate returned to its own chamber and adjourned to the same hour. When the senate met January 6, it at once adjourned till 9 o'clock, January 8. The senate, therefore, not being in session after 10 o'clock on January 6, did not proceed to the hall of the house as a body, though certain members of the senate attended. The body thus assembled consisted of a majority of the house and a minority of the members of the senate, together constituting a majority of the members of the convention. They proceeded to ballot, and Mr. Harlan received 52 votes (52 being a majority of the members of the joint convention), and was declared duly elected. The senate of Iowa sent resolutions to the United States Senate protesting against the validity of the election. Mr. Harlan was admitted to the seat December 3, 1855, the first day that Congress met in the term for which he was elected. December 15, 1856, the subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. January 5, 1857, the committee reported the proceedings of the Iowa legislature and the resolution "that the seat of the aforesaid gentleman be declared vacant," which resolution passed the Senate January 12, 1857, by a vote of 28 yeas to 18 nays. The question to be decided by the Senate, which was debated at great length, was whether the body electing Mr. Harlan was the legislature of Iowa within the meaning of the first clause of the third section of Article I of the Constitution; whether it was essential to the validity of the election that the senate as a body should be present, or whether a majority of the individual members of the convention constituted the legislature even if the senate as a body was not present, nor even a majority of the members composing the senate. Extracts from speeches, which are given below, give a full statement of the facts and points discussed by the Senate.

The history of the case here given consists of an extract from a speech of Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, in support of the resolution reported by the committee, taken from page 249 of the Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856–'57; an extract from a speech of Mr. Seward, of New York, in opposition to the resolution, taken from pages 260, 261 of the same volume; a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to the case from Senate Journals, 2d sess. 33d Cong., 1st and 2d sess. 34th Cong., and 3d sess. 34th Cong.; and the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 3d sess. 34th Cong., Report No. 300.

The debates in the case are found in the Congressional Globe, 3d sess., 34th Cong., 1856–'57. Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

[Extract from speech of Mr. Bayard delivered January 7, 1857.]

"The substantial facts of the case I understand to be these: A resolution was passed in the house of representatives of Iowa on the 13th of December, 1854, proposing to the senate of Iowa to meet in joint convention on the 15th of December for the purpose of electing a Senator of the United States. The resolution was amended by the senate by fixing 2 o'clock or 2.30 o'clock of the same day for the joint meeting. The house concurred in the amendment, and the bodies went into joint convention on that day, a quorum of each house being present when they met. They proceeded to ballot, and having balloted ineffectually they adjourned at various times—on one occasion, I think, from the 14th of December, 1854, to the 5th of January, 1855. On the 5th of January they met, and still failed to elect a Senator. They adjourned to 10 o'clock on Saturday morning, the 6th of January. The senate (as throughout the whole of these proceedings it appears each house did) after they separated returned to their own chamber and adjourned to the same hour on the next day. When the senate met at 10 o'clock on the 6th of January they, without doing any business whatever, adjourned to Monday at 9 o'clock. This adjournment was carried by a vote of the majority, on the yeas and nays—16 to 15—the whole body, consisting of thirty-one members, being present. The senate of Iowa was, therefore, not in session on Saturday after 10 o'clock.

"The house of representatives met—at what hour I do not know; but after transacting appropriate business as a house of representatives they proceeded to receive, not the senate of Iowa, which was not in session, but to receive members of the senate of Iowa as members of the joint convention; and when those members were assembled there, together with the members of the house, they constituted a majority of the two branches combined, that is, a majority of the whole number of persons in the convention. But there was present—I speak now of persons present in the sense of legal presence, as evidenced by the vote—only a majority of the house and a minority of the senate, a quorum of one body and not a quorum of the other. The speaker of the house assumed that the members thus assembled were a regularly-organized convention of the legislature with the power to elect a United States Senator. No vote was taken by the convention on that point. An appeal was taken from the decision and it was contended that the house ought to decide whether it was organized. That appeal the speaker denied, and there was no vote taken by the convention on that question at all. The roll was called, and as a majority of the members of both branches (not a majority of each branch) answered to their names the speaker declared that the joint convention was regularly organized according to its adjournment, and they proceeded to vote for a United States Senator. After electing first a teller in lieu of the senate teller, who was absent, and also a president pro tempore of the convention, the members proceeded to vote viva voce for a Senator of the United States. A majority of the members of the house of representatives voted, but only fifteen senators voted on that occasion.

"These are the real facts of the case as they appear from the journals and papers. On the vote to which I have just alluded being taken, it was declared that the honorable gentleman who now holds the seat was regularly elected to the Senate of the United States; and he came here and was admitted. The senate of Iowa met on the Monday morning next after the adjournment of Saturday, and after this alleged election had taken place, and their first act was to protest against it as done without their authority as a co-ordinate branch of the legislature of Iowa.

"It will be observed also from the facts of this case that the journals show that on all occasions when the two houses met they met as houses; a message was sent from one house to the other. The record shows that the senate, preceded by its president, came to the hall of the house of representatives, and the members of the senate had seats assigned them as a co-ordinate branch of the legislature; and after that was done, at all previous meetings, they proceeded to vote. On this occasion there was no senate in session; but the record shows that several members of the senate, without saying how many, were present. The fact is conceded, I understand, that there were but fifteen members of the senate who voted on that occasion, the whole senate consisting of thirty-one; and hence less than a quorum of the senate participated in the election.

"On this state of facts the question which I suppose to arise is, whether 'the legislature' of a State, under the language of the Federal Constitution delegating to the legislature the right to elect Senators of the United States, is to be taken to mean the individual members of the legislature or the body or bodies of which the legislature is composed. I suppose the term as used in the Constitution means the bodies of which the legislature is composed. The honorable Senator from Georgia, if I appreciate his argument, insists that the power being delegated to the legislature is vested in the members of the legislature, and that whenever a majority of the members of the whole legislature under a law such as that existing in Iowa vote for a man he is elected, though one of the co-ordinate branches of that legislature may not vote for him, and may, as a body, refuse to go into an election. Sir, I hold it to be a principle of law which has, I think, no exception that where two integral bodies are authorized to do an act it cannot be done without the consent of those two integral bodies. They must both be present and act in the matter or there can be no validity in the act done. This is a universal law. I can call to mind no case where a contrary principle prevails, whether relating to legislative action or corporate action. Indeed, in reference to corporations it has been decided over and over again that where there are two integral bodies who must concur in an act they must both be present and act upon the matter as bodies, not as individuals."

[Extract from speech of Mr. Seward delivered January 9, 1857.]

"The objections rest on these grounds:

"First. That the legislature of Iowa consists of two co-ordinate branches.

"Second. That it can do no valid act without the co-ordination and co-operation of both of those branches, each acting, or at least appearing in the transaction distinctly by a majority of this branch, or a quorum of it.

"I think the objection is unsound. The legislature of Iowa sustains double relations—one a local one, as the law-making authority of Iowa; the other, Federal, an electoral college to choose Senators in Congress from Iowa. In the one relation, it acts exclusively under the constitution of Iowa; in the other, exclusively under the Constitution of the United States. I may concede that in the former relation it must act by independent co-operation or co-ordination of both houses in all cases.

"I admit that the regulations, which are under review, do require the two houses to resolve themselves into one common body, in which the separate identity or individuality of those separate branches is extinguished, for the purpose of choosing a Senator in Congress. And that, when the merger has been made, and the convention constituted, it is independent of each of the two branches, and as to that transaction supersedes them both, and cannot be terminated or arrested by its own act, or by the concurrent and co-ordinate action of the two houses, being a creation of both.

"In this view, the appearance of the senators in their collective capacity at the convention was merely formal, proper in itself, but of no essential value; and the failure of the senators to practice the same form cannot vitiate the election, nor can the subsequent protest of the senate.

"It is alleged that such a complete extinguishing of the two houses of the legislature is unconstitutional.

"But it is too late to raise that question. Legislatures in the States are divided into two distinct houses, whose members differ generally in qualifications or in terms of service, to secure delay and deliberation and moderate collision in acts of legislation. But this very delay, deliberation, and collision practically disqualifies such bodies from acting as an electoral college.

"It was found necessary in the very beginning of the Government to provide for bringing the two branches of the legislature to an agreement in that case.

"The expedient adopted was the simple one, probably the only practicable one, of merging the two houses into one, for this purpose. The expedient has been adopted in nearly all the States, and is used either in the first instance, as in Iowa, or a last alternative, in case of disagreement, as in New York, Georgia, and Virginia. It has been acquiesced in by the Senate of the United States from the first, and is therefore settled and constitutional.

"Nor is it without reason. The legislature of a State is merely a college of suffragans interposed between the Senate of the United States and the people of the States. The choice of the legislature is the indirect choice of the people of the State.

"The function of choice is in no sense one of a legislative nature. It is an extra-legislative act, an executive transaction, an action, so to speak, ex officio. The Constitution of the United States gives supreme right to Congress to prescribe in what manner the legislature of a State shall perform that act independently of all State constitutions.

"The Congress of the United States has practically waived this right, and devolved that duty on the legislature of Iowa, as it was authorized to do by the Constitution of the United States.

"The manner prescribed by the legislature of Iowa does not conflict with any article of the Constitution of the United States. It would not be at all affected by any conflict with the constitution of Iowa, insomuch as no control over the subject whatever resides in the people of Iowa by whom the constitution was made.

"Mr. President, this transaction is a judicial one. I have approached it, I trust, free from partiality or prejudice. The question is an important one. The decision may be drawn into a precedent to affect hereafter the rights of sixty States, and the safety, welfare, and union of this confederate Republic hundreds of years hence, when this people shall number, not as now by tens, but by hundreds of millions.

"I therefore confine my judgment to this case as it stands on the facts. I do not prejudge other cases which shall present other facts, nor lay down principles for other and extreme cases. I can foresee possible abuses to come from a misapplication of the principles I have adopted. But abuses will attach themselves to all principles as barnacles will to the smoothest and strongest bottoms.

"I repose on my conclusion with the more confidence because it is one which tends to secure the Senate, and through it the Federal Government, against the efforts of faction and of ambition to disorganize the Union and subvert the republican Government here, which is the chief guarantee of civilization everywhere."

SATURDAY, March 3, 1855.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the president of the senate of Iowa, accompanied by resolutions of the senate of that State, relative to the joint convention alleged to have been held by the general assembly of Iowa for the election of an associate judge and a United States Senator; which was read.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 3, 1855.

Mr. Jones, of Iowa, presented the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, chosen a Senator by the general assembly of the State of Iowa "to represent" the said State "in the Senate of the United States;" which were read.

On motion by Mr. Mason, the resolutions of the senate of the State of Iowa, communicated March 3, 1855, were read.

The oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Harlan, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[These resolutions are found in the report of the committee given below.]

THURSDAY, August 14, 1856.

On motion by Mr. Jones, of Iowa, that the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, of Iowa, with the resolutions of the senate of Iowa relative to his election as a Senator from that State, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the motion be postponed to and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

FRIDAY, August 15, 1856.

On motion by Mr. Hunter that the special order of the day be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 201) making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1857, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 19.

[The vote may be found on page 593 of Senate Journal, 1st and 2d sess. 34th Cong., 1855–'56.]

MONDAY, December 15, 1856.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made by Mr. Jones, of Iowa, the 14th of August last, to refer the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. Bayard to amend the motion by striking out "to the Committee on the Judiciary" and inserting "a select committee,"

The question was put on referring the same to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 13.

[The vote is found on page 42 of the Senate Journal, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856–'57.]

So it was Ordered, That the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, of the State of Iowa, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[A statement of the facts of the case by Mr. Harlan, also a debate on the question whether the subject should more properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to a select committee, are found on pages 112–117 of the Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856–'57.]

MONDAY, January 5, 1857.

Mr. Butler, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, a Senator from the State of Iowa, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the seat of the aforesaid gentleman be declared vacant."

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The Committee on the Judiciary consisted of Messrs. Butler (chairman), Toucey, Bayard, Geyer, Toombs, and Pugh.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 5, 1857.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Butler made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan and the protest of the senate of Iowa, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following statement:

The following proceedings were had in the legislature of the State of Iowa in the election of a United States Senator:

SATURDAY, December 9, 1854.

"Resolved (the senate concurring), That the house of representatives will meet the senate in the hall of the house on Tuesday next at 2 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of electing a Senator of the United States and judges of the supreme court.

"On motion,

"The resolution was laid on the table."

DECEMBER 12, 1854.

Resolution fixing the time for the election of a United States Senator was taken up and amended so as to fix Friday, the 15th instant, as the day for an election.

"Message from the senate, by Mr. Rankin, their secretary:

"Mr. SPEAKER: I am instructed by the senate to inform the house that the senate has concurred in the house resolution to go into joint ballot on Friday, the 15th instant, for the purpose of electing a United States Senator and supreme judges, with the following amendment, viz: To strike out the words 'Friday, the 15th instant, at 2 o'clock,' and insert this: 'Wednesday evening, at 2.30 o'clock.'

"Agreed to.

"Joint convention of the two houses; the president of the senate acting as president of the convention, and the clerk of the house acting as secretary."

On motion, the convention proceeded to the election of a United States Senator for six years, from and after the 4th day of March next.

"The president appointed Mr. Workman teller on the part of the senate. The speaker appointed Mr. Kinert teller on the part of the house."

The convention proceeded to a vote, which resulted in no choice.

The convention proceeded to a second ballot, which resulted in no choice.

The convention adjourned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

DECEMBER 14, 1854.

By order of the president the roll of the convention was called.

Same tellers as yesterday.

Motion to adjourn until Thursday next at 10 o'clock.

Motion prevailed.

"The president announced the convention adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m. Thursday, December 21."

THURSDAY, December 21, 1854.

Joint convention of the two houses; the president of the senate acting as president of the convention, and the clerk of the house acting as secretary.

Same tellers acting.

The president having announced the purposes of the convention, and directed the roll to be called—

"The convention proceeded to vote for a United States Senator for the term of six years, from and after the 4th day of March next."

After several ballots without making a choice, the convention adjourned until the 5th day of January, 1855.

FRIDAY, January 5, 1855.

Convention met.

The president announced the purposes of the convention.

After several ineffectual ballots, on motion, the convention adjourned until to-morrow morning 10 o'clock.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1855.

"It being the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., the speaker of the house announced the same, and the special order to be a joint convention of the senate and house of representatives, pursuant to adjournment, for the purposes of electing a United States Senator and judge of the supreme court.

"A committee of three was appointed to wait upon the senate, and inform that body that the house of representatives was now ready to receive the senate in joint convention," &c.

"The committee appointed to wait on the senate reported that they had discharged that duty, by proceeding to the senate chamber and delivering their message, and informing the secretary of the senate thereof; that the secretary informed the committee that the senate had adjourned over to Monday next.

"A number of the members of the senate entered the hall of the house without their president and took their seats.

"The speaker announced that the joint convention of the senate and house of representatives was now in session, pursuant to adjournment, for the purposes of electing a judge of the supreme court and a United States Senator.

"Mr. Samuels rose to a question of order, to wit: Was the joint convention properly convened? The speaker announced that the convention had now convened.

"Mr. Samuels appealed from the decision of the speaker, and asked for the yeas and nays, and insisted on his appeal being decided only by the house of representatives.

"The roll of the joint convention was called, and the following members of the convention answered to their names, being a majority of both branches of the general assembly.

[Here follow the names of fifty-seven members.]

"Those members of the convention and members of the house of representatives, except Mr. Franklin, excused, who did not answer to their names refused to answer, or retired from the hall during the call of the roll.

"The speaker announced that a majority of the members of the general assembly being present, that there was a quorum of the joint convention now convened, pursuant to adjournment, and that the appeal of Mr. Samuels could not be taken to the members of the house of representatives only.

"On motion of Senator Anderson, William W. Hamilton, a senator from Dubuque County, was elected president pro tempore of the convention.

"The president of the senate still being absent,

"The speaker of the house of representatives in his chair, and the clerk of the house of representatives acting as secretary of the joint convention,

"The roll of the convention was called, and the following members of the convention did not answer to their names, to wit.

[Here follow the names of forty-four members.]

"On motion of Mr. Russell,

"The sergeant-at-arms was directed to notify members of the convention who had not answered to their names that the convention was now convened, and to request their attendance.

"Senators Ramsay and Thurston appeared on the floor of the convention and desired to be considered as not acting in the convention.

"The sergeant-at-arms reported that he had performed his duty, as required by the convention; that a few of the members he could not find.

"On motion of Mr. Conkey,

"Further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

"Mr. Workman, teller on the part of the senate, being absent,

"Mr. Needham was appointed in his stead,

"Mr. Kinert acting as teller on the part of the house.

"The convention proceeded to the election of a second associate judge of the supreme court;" after which "the convention proceeded to the election of a United States Senator for the State of Iowa for the term of six years from and after the 4th of March next. * * *

"Mr. Anderson nominated James Harlan, of Henry County.

"The convention proceeded to vote for a United States Senator, being the ninth vote, which resulted as follows:

"Those voting for James Harlan were—

[Here follow the names of fifty-two members.]

"Messrs Clark, of Marion, and Neely voted for Bernhart Henn; Mr. McAchran voted for Wm. McKay; Mr. Witter voted for James Grant. James Harlan having received a majority of all the votes cast and a majority of the whole number of the members of the general assembly, was declared duly elected a Senator of the United States for the State of Iowa for the term of six years from and after the 4th day of March next.

"The certificate of election was made out and duly attested in the presence of the convention," &c. * * *

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 6, 1855.

This will certify that, at an election by the general assembly of the State of Iowa, in joint convention, on Saturday, the 6th day of January, A. D. 1855, James Harlan was duly elected a Senator to represent this State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years from and after the 4th day of March next.

WILLIAM W. HAMILTON,
President pro tempore.
REUBEN NOBLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

JOHN R. NEEDHAM,
DAVID KINERT,
Tellers.

On motion of Mr. Hills, the joint convention adjourned sine die, and the members of the senate retired.—Journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Iowa.

MONDAY MORNING, January 8, 1855.

Mr. Coolbaugh offered the following:

"Whereas it is reported that the journal of the house of representatives, as read this morning in the presence of the house, alleges that a joint convention of the general assembly of this State was held in the hall of the house on Saturday, the 6th instant; and,

"Whereas it is alleged in said journal that said joint convention proceeded to elect one Norman W. Isbell as an associate judge of the supreme court of this State and one James

Harlan as a Senator of the United States for the term of six years from the 4th day of March next: Therefore,

"Resolved, That inasmuch as the senate has no knowledge of any such joint convention, and did not participate in the proceedings, therefore it hereby protests against the action of the said so-called joint convention, and declares the same to be void and of no effect.

"Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be signed by the president and certified to by the secretary of the senate, be presented to the governor of this State, and also a copy forwarded to the presiding officer of the Senate of the United States, with the request to lay the same before that body."

Upon the adoption of which, the yeas and nays, being demanded, were ordered, and were as follows—yeas 17, nays 14.

The preamble and resolutions were adopted.—Journal of the senate of the State of Iowa, 1854–'55.

AN ACT to provide for the election of United States Senators and other officers.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Iowa, That at each and every regular session of the general assembly of this State next preceding the expiration of the constitutional term of service of a United States Senator, or at any session when a vacancy shall exist, at an hour to be designated by a resolution of either branch, with the concurrence of the other branch of the general assembly, the members of both houses thereof shall meet in convention in the hall of the house of representatives, for the purpose of electing a Senator or Senators by joint vote, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, to represent this State in the Senate of the United States.

SEC. 2. The president of the senate, or in his absence the speaker of the house of representatives, shall preside over the deliberations of the convention; and in the absence of both a president pro tempore shall be appointed by joint vote.

SEC. 3. At any time prior to meeting in convention as aforesaid, after the time for meeting has been designated as aforesaid, each branch of the general assembly shall appoint one teller, and the two tellers thus appointed shall act as judges of the election.

SEC. 4. The secretary of the senate and the chief clerk of the house of representatives shall each keep a fair and correct record of the proceedings of the convention, which shall be entered upon the journals of each branch of the general assembly. The chief clerk of the house of representatives shall act as secretary to the convention.

SEC. 5. The names of the members of the general assembly shall be arranged by the secretary in alphabetical order, and each member shall vote in the order in which his name stands when thus arranged.

SEC. 6. When the convention shall be organized as aforesaid the members present shall proceed to choose viva voce a Senator or Senators, as the case may be, to represent this State in the Senate of the United States. The name of the person voted for and of the members voting shall be entered in writing by the tellers, who shall, after the secretary shall have called the names of the members a second time, and the name of the person for which each member has voted, report to the president of the convention the number of votes given for each candidate.

SEC. 7. If neither of the candidates shall receive the votes of a majority of the members present a second poll may be taken, and so from time to time until some one of the candidates shall receive a majority of the votes of the members present.

SEC. 8. If the election shall not be completed at the first meeting the president shall adjourn the convention whenever and to such time as a majority of the members then present shall determine; and so from time to time, until some one of the candidates shall receive a majority as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. When any person shall have received a majority of the votes aforesaid the president of the convention shall declare him to be duly elected a Senator to represent this State in the Senate of the United States; and he shall in the presence of the members of both houses sign two certificates of election, attested by the tellers, one of which he shall transmit to the governor, and the remaining one shall be preserved among the records of the convention and entered at length on the journals of each house of the general assembly.

SEC. 10. Upon the reception of said certificate the governor shall cause a credential to be made out, with the great seal of the State affixed thereto, and cause it to be delivered to such Senator-elect, which credential shall be in form following.

The Constitution of the United States contains the following provision in reference to the election of United States Senators:

"SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

And the clause under which the committee are acting as to the qualification of the gentleman is as follows:

"SEC. 5. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." * * *

STATE OF IOWA, to wit:

The general assembly of this State, on the sixth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, having, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States of America, chosen James Harlan a Senator to represent this State in the Senate of the United States, I, James W. Grimes, governor of the State of Iowa, do by these presents certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Iowa, this twentieth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five.

[L. S.] JAMES W. GRIMES.

By the governor:

GEORGE W. McCLEARY,
Secretary of State.

The foregoing statement of facts and recital of clauses of laws and the Constitution present all the questions involved in the controversy growing out of the contested election under consideration. From the view which a majority of the committee have taken of these questions, they have come to the conclusion that the sitting member (Mr. Harlan) has not been duly elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of Iowa.

Resolved, That the seat of the aforesaid gentleman be declared vacant.

A. P. BUTLER,
Chairman.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1857.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, a Senator from the State of Iowa; and,

On motion by Mr. Bayard that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until half-past 12 o'clock to-morrow, it was determined in the negative.

After debate,

An amendment being proposed by Mr. Toombs,

On motion by Mr. Weller,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 238–247 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1857.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, a Senator from the State of Iowa; and,

After debate and the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 9, 1857.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, a Senator from the State of Iowa; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Mallory, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, January 12, 1857.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of the Hon. James Harlan, a Senator from the State of Iowa.

On motion by Mr. Toombs to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting:

"That James Harlan is entitled to his seat as a Senator from Iowa,"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 27.

On motion by Mr. Butler, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bell of New Hampshire, Bell of Tennessee, Brown, Collamer, Durkee, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Foster, Hale, Houston, Pugh, Seward, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Butler, Cass, Clay, Comegys, Crittenden, Dodge, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Iverson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Pratt, Reid, Rusk, Sebastian, Stuart, Toucey, Weller, and Wright.

On motion by Mr. Butler, the resolution was amended to read:

"Resolved, That the seat of the Hon. James Harlan be declared vacant."

On the question to agree to the resolution it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 18.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Butler, Cass, Clay, Comegys, Crittenden, Dodge, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Iverson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Reid, Rusk, Sebastian, Stuart, Toucey, Weller, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bell of New Hampshire, Bell of Tennessee, Brown, Collamer, Durkee, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Foster, Hale, Houston, Pugh, Seward, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

[The debate is concluded on pages 287–299 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

[Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Congresses.]

GRAHAM N. FITCH AND JESSE D. BRIGHT, LANE AND McCARTY VS. FITCH AND BRIGHT, of Indiana.

February 4, 1857, Graham N. Fitch was elected Senator by the legislature of Indiana for the term ending March 3, 1861, and Jesse D. Bright for the term ending March 3, 1863. February 9, 1857, Mr. Fitch's credentials were presented, and at the same time a protest of members of the legislature against the legality of the election. After debate on the prima facie right of Mr. Fitch to the seat, he was admitted, and his credentials and the protest were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The ground of the protest was that these Senators were "not elected by the legislature of Indiana, but by a convocation of a portion of the members thereof, not authorized by any law of the State, by resolution adopted by the legislature, or by any provision of the Constitution of the United States." It appears that there was no law in Indiana providing for the time, place, or manner of electing Senators. There was a clause in the State constitution making it the duty of the speaker of the house of representatives to open and publish the votes for governor and lieutenant-governor in the presence of both houses of the general assembly. January 12, 1857, the two houses met for this purpose, a majority of both houses being present. At the close of this business the presiding officer adjourned the convention (so called) until February 2. Meantime the senate passed a resolution protesting against this proceeding and disclaiming all connection with the so-called convention. A minority of the senate, but a majority of the members composing the two houses, attended the adjourned meeting, and after a subsequent adjournment elected Messrs. Fitch and Bright as Senators. February 26 and March 13, 1857, the committee reported resolutions that Mr. Fitch and the persons protesting against his election be permitted to take testimony on disputed facts. December 17, 1857, the credentials of Mr. Bright, who had taken his seat March 4, were referred, together with the credentials of Mr. Fitch, to the same committee. January 21, 1858, the committee again reported a resolution that the sitting members and the persons protesting be permitted to take testimony. January 25 the minority of the committee reported against the adoption of the resolution on the ground that the election was "obviously illegal." The resolution passed the Senate February 16, 1858. May 24, 1858, the committee reported the testimony and the resolution that the sitting members were entitled to their seats. The resolution was agreed to June 12, 1858.

January 24, 1859, a memorial of the State of Indiana was presented representing that it was the wish of the State that Henry S. Lane and William Monroe McCarty be admitted to seats in the Senate as the only legally chosen Senators. February 3, 1859, the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the memorial, reported that there was no vacancy in the Senate from the State of Indiana, and that the election of Messrs. Lane and McCarty was void; that the legislature of Indiana possessed no authority to revise the decision of the Senate of the United States on the right of Messrs Fitch and Bright to the seats, a decision which was final and made by an authority having exclusive jurisdiction, and asked to be excused from the further consideration of the subject. February 3, 1859, the minority reported that the former decision of the Senate was not necessarily final; that under the circumstances the subject should be re-examined; and that if the Senate should find that Messrs Lane and McCarty were legally elected, they should be admitted to the seats. February 14, 1859, the Senate agreed to the report of the committee and resolved that the decision of June 12, 1858, affirming the right of Messrs Fitch and Bright to their seats, "was a final decision of all the premises then in controversy, and conclusive, as well upon the legislature of Indiana, and all persons claiming under its authority, as upon the Senators named in the resolution."

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journals, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1st sess. 35th Cong., and 2d sess. 35th Cong., together with certain of the reports made in the case.

Special references to the debates found in the Congressional Globe of the 3d sess. of 34th Cong. and the 35th Cong., are inserted below, and special references to all the reports are given in footnotes.

[Third session of the Thirty-fourth Congress.]

MONDAY, February 9, 1857.

Mr. Bright presented the credentials of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, elected a Senator by the legislature of Indiana, to serve in the Congress of the United States until the 4th day of March, 1861; which were read.

Mr. Bright submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the President do administer the oath required by the laws to Graham N. Fitch as a Senator from the State of Indiana."

Mr. Trumbull presented resolutions of the senate of the State of Indiana respecting the recent election of Senators by the legislature of that State, and a protest of members of the house of representatives of the State of Indiana against the legality of the election of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as Senators in the Congress of the United States; which were read; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull that the credentials, the resolution submitted by Mr. Bright, and the resolutions of the senate of Indiana, with the protest of members of the house of representatives of the general assembly of Indiana, presented by Mr. Trumbull, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 33.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Collamer, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Nourse, Seward, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Adams, Allen, Bayard, Bell of Tennessee, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Butler, Cass, Clay, Dodge, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Green, Hunter, James, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Pratt, Pugh, Reid, Rusk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Toombs, Toucey, Weller, and Yulee.

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Bright, and the resolution was agreed to; and

The oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Fitch, and he took his seat in the Senate.

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Rusk that the credentials of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, the resolutions of the senate of Indiana, and the protest of members of the house of representatives of Indiana respecting the recent election of Senators by the legislature of that State, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary,

On motion by Mr. Stuart, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 193–210 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, 3d sess., 34th Cong., 1856–'57 It is largely on the prima facie right of Mr. Fitch to the seat.]

TUESDAY, February 10, 1857.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. Rusk to refer the credentials of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, with the resolutions of the senate of Indiana and the protest of members of the house of representatives of that State in relation to the recent election of Senators by the legislature of Indiana, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the motion was agreed to.

[The debate is found on pages 210–215 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, 3d sess., 34th Cong., 1856–'57. It is mainly on the question whether the credentials should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or to a select committee.]

THURSDAY, February 12, 1857.

Mr. Trumbull presented a protest, signed by members of the house of representatives of Indiana, against the legality of the election by the legislature of that State of Jesse D. Bright and Graham N. Fitch as Senators in the Congress of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRIDAY, February 20, 1857.

Mr. Trumbull presented copies of the proceedings of the legislature of Indiana, and other papers, in relation to the recent election of Senators to represent that State in the Congress of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THURSDAY, February 26, 1857.

Mr. Trumbull presented a petition of senators and representatives of the legislature of Indiana, protesting against the election of Graham N. Fitch as a Senator to represent that State in the Congress of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. Toombs, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as a Senator in Congress from the State of Indiana, the proceedings of the senate of Indiana, and the protest of members of the house of representatives of the said State against the election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, submitted a report (No. 427), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, a Senator returned and admitted to his seat from the State of Indiana, that the sitting member and all persons protesting against his election be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting member, touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis."*

[A short debate as to whether the resolution is a privileged question or not is found on pages 907, 908 of the Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856–'57.]

* This report is found in Senate Reports, 3d sess. 34th Cong., Report No. 427. It is not printed here, as it is substantially the same as the report made March 13, 1857, on the same subject, which is printed.

MONDAY, March 2, 1857.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, a Senator from the State of Indiana; and

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Weller that it lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 23.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Adams, Allen, Bayard, Benjamin Biggs, Brown, Butler, Clay, Crittenden, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, James, Johnson, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Pugh, Reid, Rusk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Toombs, Toucey, and Weller.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bell of New Hampshire, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Collamer, Dodge, Durkee, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Nourse, Seward, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

MR. BRIGHT'S CREDENTIALS.

Mr. Cass presented the credentials of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Indiana, to serve as such until the 4th day of March, A. D. 1863; which were read.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1857.]

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1857.

The credentials of Mr. Bright having been heretofore presented to the Senate, the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the President pro tempore, and he took his seat in the Senate.

MONDAY, March 9, 1857.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

Ordered, That the papers on file relating to the election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch by the legislature of Indiana be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[A brief debate took place, which is found on pages 385, 386 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856-'57.]

FRIDAY, March 13, 1857.

Mr. Toombs, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the papers relating to the election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, by the legislature of the State of Indiana, as a Senator in the Congress of the United States, submitted a report (No. 2), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, a Senator returned and admitted to his seat from the State of Indiana, that the sitting member and all persons protesting against his election, or any of them, by themselves or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting member touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis."

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to reconsider the said resolution; and,

A motion having been made by Mr. Trumbull to amend the resolution,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Mason,

Ordered, That it lie on the table

On motion by Mr. Toombs,

Ordered, That the report and all the accompanying papers be printed.

[The debate which took place this day on the adoption of the resolution is found on pages 392–396 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, 3d sess., 34th Cong., 1856-'57.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE. *

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Butler (chairman), Bayard, Toombs, Pugh, Benjamin, Collamer, and Trumbull.]

The committee have had the same under consideration, and find that important matters of fact alleged by the protestants in connection with the manner in which the election of the sitting member was had are denied by him, and that it becomes necessary, in the opinion of the committee, to take the testimony of persons residing in the State of Indiana, for the better ascertainment of these disputed facts. For instance, it is, among other things, alleged by a portion of the protestants that "there was no joint convention of the two houses of said general assembly on said day" on which the election in dispute took place, and that a minority only of the legally sitting senators of Indiana participated in said election, which statements are denied by the sitting member; and he affirms, on the contrary, that "he was elected to said office by a majority of all the members composing the legislature of the State, they being then and for that purpose assembled in joint convention," and that he was elected whilst in such joint convention by a majority of the legally qualified members of the senate of the State and of the legally qualified members of the house of representatives, respectively. For the proper ascertainment of these contested facts, and the better elucidation of the matters in dispute contained in the several protests herewith submitted, and the reply of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, your committee recommend that leave be given to take testimony in the city of Indianapolis and State of Indiana, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, a Senator returned and admitted to his seat from the State of Indiana, that the sitting member, and all persons protesting against his election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting member touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis.

To the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, duly elected and qualified members of the house of representatives of the general assembly of the State of Indiana, hereby protest against the pretended election of Jesse D. Bright and Graham N. Fitch, on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1857, as Senators of the State of Indiana in the Congress of the United States, the former for the six years from the 4th day of March next, and the latter for the six years from the 4th day of March, 1855, by a portion of the senators and representatives of said general assembly, for the following reasons:

First. There was no agreement of the two houses of the general assembly, by resolutions or otherwise, to proceed to the appointment or election of Senators in Congress on said day, or any other day of the present session of the general assembly.

Second. There was no joint convention of the two houses of the said general assembly on said day; nor was there any law of the State authorizing a joint convention on that or any other day for the appointment or election of United States Senators; nor was there any resolution, or joint resolution, approved or adopted by the two houses of the said general assembly, or either of them, authorizing such joint convention.

Third. Said pretended joint convention was a mere assembly of a portion of the senators and representatives of the said general assembly, not in a legislative capacity, but as individuals, without any authority of law, without precedent in the history of legislature of the State, and having no legislative sanction; and said senators and representatives, when so convened, had no more constitutional right to appoint or elect Senators than any equal number of private citizens of the State.

Fourth. There was not a constitutional quorum of either house of the general assembly present in said pretended joint convention, there being only twenty-three senators and sixty-one representatives, when, by the eleventh section of the fourth article of the constitution of this State, it requires two-thirds of each house to constitute a quorum to do business, and when, by the law of the State, the number of senators is fixed at fifty, and the number of representatives at one hundred, in said general assembly.

Fifth. Because the undersigned, as legally elected and qualified representatives in said general assembly, have been deprived of their constitutional right to assist in the legal election of the Senators in the Congress of the United States by said illegal, revolutionary, and unauthorized election.

* This report, which was the second one made on the credentials of Mr. Fitch, is found in Senate Reports, 3d sess. 34th Cong., Report No. 2. Pages 5-39 of the report are here omitted. They contain certain proceedings of the legislature and additional protests of members thereof.

Sixth. Because the legislature of Indiana, as such legislature, either by separate action of the two houses, or otherwise, as such legislature, had no part or voice in such pretended elections, and the same were in direct violation of the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States and the fourth section of the said article.

Seventh. Because said pretended elections are wholly void.

Eighth. Because if said elections are held valid, such decision will destroy the legal existence of the general assembly of this State, and install in its place any mob which may see proper to take forcible possession of the house as a joint convention of the general assembly, without the concurrence of either body, the sanction of the Constitution, or authority of law.

For these and other reasons which might be named, the undersigned protest against the validity of said pretended elections, and ask that the Senate of the United States may declare them null and void.

Given under our hands this 4th day of February, at Indianapolis, A. D. 1857.

The undersigned, a Senator of the United States from the State of Indiana, and now acting as a duly qualified Senator of the United States, submits to the honorable the Judiciary Committee of the body to whom the validity of his election has been referred, the following, as points upon which he believes and is advised that his own rights and the rights of his State require that evidence be taken and be before the committee in order to enable them to decide understandingly and justly in the premises:

First. That he was elected to said office by a majority of all the members composing the legislature of the State, they being then and for that purpose assembled in joint convention.

Second. That he was elected, whilst in such joint convention, by a majority of the legally qualified members of the senate of the State and of the legally qualified members of the house of representatives, respectively.

Third. That in order to ascertain the facts stated in the preceding point, he will be able, by evidence, to show that three of the persons who are contesting his election were not then, and are not now, legally members of the said State senate, and had no right whatever, under the laws and constitution of the State, to be considered, or, in any particular, to act as members of that body; and that this was at the time, and still is, well known to the other contestants.

Fourth. That in the organization of the State senate, according to the constitution, laws, and usage of the State, the lieutenant-governor presides and superintends the admission of the members, and the taking the required oaths of office. That upon this occasion, in violation of such constitution, laws, and usage, the said three members, who were without the expressly required credentials of election, the certificate of the proper and only returning officer, and whose seats were also known to be contested, and on grounds of fraud, also known to be true, were, by a presiding officer, chosen for the purpose by the members of the senate, designated as Republicans, contrary to all law, and by naked wrong, directed, notwithstanding, to be sworn in, and for the clear purpose, illegal and fraudulent in fact, of defeating an election of Senators of the United States.

Fifth. That the said convention by whom, as hereinbefore alleged, the undersigned was elected a Senator of the United States, was assembled in accordance with an express provision of the constitution of the State, and that, in accordance with the long and uniform usage of the State in that particular, the same was adjourned from day to day by the proper presiding officer thereof, and vested with the authority so to adjourn, and that each adjournment was made without objection by a majority of the senate, even considering the three persons aforesaid to have been members of that body being present.

Sixth That there is not now, in said State, as the undersigned is advised, any law for the regulation of the election of Senators of the United States, or in any way providing for the same; and that according to the best professional and judicial opinions in the State, the election is to be made by the convention of the legislature assembled under the constitution of the State, to count the votes and decide upon the election of governor and lieutenant-governor, as a power necessarily existing in the legislature, and from the obligations of the State to elect Senators.

Seventh. That before the adoption of the present State constitution there was a law regulating such election, and that although the same was no longer in force, the said convention did, as far as it was possible, conduct the present election according to the provisions thereof.

The undersigned, in conclusion, submits what, indeed, must be obvious to the committee, that as the witnesses and proofs to the matters above stated are only to be had in the State of Indiana, and can only properly be obtained by careful examination, and under the superintendence of himself, that it cannot be in his power to procure it at this or the approaching extra session of the United States Senate, even were he to abandon his duty as a Senator, which he has no right to do, and proceed at once to the place where the testimony is to be had. He further submits, therefore, that the committee will so dispose of the matter now as will enable him and the contestants at a future period to present the entire case fairly and fully before them.

GRAHAM N. FITCH.

[A short debate in reference to correcting a mistake in the Senate Journal took place. The Journal showed that on Monday, March 9, 1857, Mr. Bright's credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. This was an error, and the Journal was corrected so that it read for that day as given above. [First session of the Thirty-fifth Congress.]

THURSDAY, December 17, 1857.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the credentials of the sitting members of this body from the State of Indiana, together with all the papers on file protesting against their rights to seats, or relating to their election as Senators in Congress by the legislature of Indiana, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary."

THURSDAY, January 21, 1858.

Mr. Bayard, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred, by a resolution of the Senate of the 17th of December, the credentials of the sitting members of this body from the State of Indiana, with all the papers on file protesting against their rights to seats, or relating to their election as Senators in Congress by the legislature of Indiana, submitted a report (No. 19), accompanied by the following resolution. [Resolution found at end of report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Bayard (chairman), Green, Toombs, Pugh, Benjamin, Collamer, and Trumbull.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the protest against the election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright as Senators in Congress from the State of Indiana, report:

The committee find that the protests against the election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as a Senator in Congress from the State of Indiana were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on the 10th of February, 1857, and on the 26th of the same month a resolution was reported by the committee authorizing testimony to be taken both by the protestants and the sitting member. The resolution not being acted upon by the Senate at that session, from the pressure of other business, the protests were again referred to the committee on the 9th of March last, at the special session of the Senate, and the same resolution, with a slight amendment, reported by the committee on the 13th of the same month, which being taken up on the day it was reported, a debate ensued upon an amendment offered by the Hon. Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, and the Senate having on the previous day resolved to adjourn sine die on the 14th of March, at 1 o'clock, the resolution reported by the committee was ordered to lie on the table.

* This report, taken from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 35th Cong., Report No. 19, is the third report made by the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of Mr. Fitch and the first one on the credentials of Mr. Bright.

The protests against the election of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, as well as against the election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, having been referred at the present session, and the objections of the protestants and allegations of the sitting members being identical in both cases, the committee have adopted and recommend the passage of the resolution reported to the Senate by the committee at the special session on the 13th day of March last, with such variation as is requisite to make it apply to the cases of both the sitting members, as follows:

"Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted to their seats from the State of Indiana, the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis."

Mr. Trumbull submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Senators from Indiana, and other papers on file relating to their election as Senators in Congress; which were ordered to be printed.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.*

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the protests against the right of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright to seats as Senators from the State of Indiana, report:

The legislature of Indiana called the general assembly, is composed of a senate of fifty members and a house of representatives of one hundred members, and two-thirds of each house is, by the constitution, required to constitute a quorum thereof. Each house is declared to be judge of the election and qualification of its members, and required to keep a journal of its proceedings. No regulation exists by law in Indiana as to the manner in which members of the State senate are to be inducted into office. No law or regulation is there existing providing the time, place, or manner of electing United States Senators.

It appears by the journal of the senate of Indiana that on the opening of the senate at the meeting of the legislature, January 8, 1857, forty-nine of the senators were present, and that all the newly elected members were duly sworn, took their seats, and continued thereafter to act with the other senators till the close of the session. The only absentee senator took his seat January 13, 1857. Protests were filed contesting the seats of three of the newly elected members, which were afterwards examined and considered by the senate, and they were each found and declared to be entitled to seats, respectively, by majorities more or less numerous, all which is entered upon and appears by the journal of said senate.

The State constitution makes it the duty of the speaker of the house of representatives to open and publish the votes for governor and lieutenant-governor in the presence of both houses of the general assembly. No provision exists by the constitution making such meeting or presence of the two houses a convention, or providing any officers there for, or authorizing or empowering the same to transact any business whatever, except by joint vote forthwith to proceed to elect a governor or lieutenant-governor in case of a tie vote.

Both houses being in session, the speaker notified them that he should proceed to open and publish the votes for governor and lieutenant-governor on Monday the 12th day of January, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., in the hall of the house. Shortly before the hour arrived the president of the senate announced that he would proceed immediately to the hall of the house of representatives; and thereupon, together with such senators as chose to go, being a minority of the whole number thereof, he repaired to the hall of the house of representatives, and there, in their presence, and in the presence of the members of the house, the votes for governor and lieutenant-governor were duly counted and published by the speaker, and A. P. Willard, the then president of the senate, was declared duly elected governor and A. A. Hammon lieutenant-governor of said State.

At the close of this business, a senator present, without any vote for that purpose, declared the meeting (by him then called a convention) adjourned to the 2d day of February, 1857, at 2 o'clock.

The senate hearing of this proceeding, on the 29th day of January, 1857 as appears by its journal, passed a resolution protesting against the proceedings of said so-called convention, disclaiming all connection therewith or recognizance thereof, and protesting against any election of United States Senators or any other officer thereby. On the 2d of February, 1857, the president of the senate, with a minority of its members, again attended in the hall of the house, and without proceeding to any business, and without any vote, declared the meeting (by him called a convention) adjourned until the 4th day of February, 1857, at which time the president of the senate, with twenty-four of its members, went to the hall of the house of representatives, and there they, together with sixty-two members of the house, proceeded to elect two Senators of the United States, to wit, Graham N. Fitch, and Jesse D. Bright, they each receiving eighty-three votes, and no more, at their respective elections, twenty-three of which votes were by members of the senate.

Against these elections so made protests by twenty-seven members of the senate of Indiana and thirty-five members of the house of representatives of said State have been duly presented, alleging that, in the absence of any law, joint resolution, or regulation of any kind by the two houses composing the legislature of Indiana providing for holding a joint convention, it is not competent for a minority of the members of the senate and a majority, but less than a quorum, of the members of the house of representatives of said State to assemble together and make an election of United States Senators.

Of the facts as herein stated there is no dispute, as we understand.

It is now alleged by the sitting Senators, respectively, as we understand the substance of their allegations, in contradiction of the senate journal, that the three State senators whose seats were contested were not legally elected and qualified; that they were without the expressly required credentials, the certificate of the proper and only returning officer, and that they were, notwithstanding, directed to be sworn in by a presiding officer chosen for the purpose by the members of the senate designated as Republicans, for the clear purpose, illegal and fraudulent in fact, of defeating an election of Senators of the United States.

Under these circumstances we object to the adoption of the resolution for the taking of testimony to sustain these allegations, because the said election of United States Senators, so conducted, is obviously illegal and insufficient, and cannot be cured by any proof of these allegations; and we insist that the Senate should now proceed to a definitive decision of the question.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1858.

MONDAY, February 15, 1858.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, and the protest against their election as Senators in Congress from the State of Indiana; and

The amendment proposed by Mr. Trumbull being under consideration,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Hunter,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

[The subject is debated on pages 698–710 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 35th Cong.]

TUESDAY, February 16, 1858.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright; and

On the question to agree to the following amendment, proposed by Mr. Trumbull: Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

"That the Senate will now proceed to a final determination of the right to seats in this body of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, claiming to have been elected Senators by the legislature of Indiana,"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clay, Evans, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee.

On motion by Mr. Seward to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"Provided, That the proofs to be taken shall be limited to the swearing in of the members of the legislature of Indiana, the organization of the said legislature, and the proceedings thereof connected with the election of the sitting members for said State in the Senate of the United States, and shall be returned to the Senate of the United States within sixty days from the passage of this resolution,"

A division was called for by Mr. Hale; and, the question being taken on the first clause, relating to the proofs to be taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 25.

On motion by Mr. Mallory, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, and Yulee.

On the question to agree to the second clause, as follows: "And shall be returned to the Senate of the United States within sixty days from the passage of this resolution,"

A motion was made by Mr. Pugh to amend the same by striking out the word "sixty" and inserting "ninety;" and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 18.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Evans, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, and Wade.

On motion by Mr. Toombs to amend the amendment by adding thereto—

"And provided, That no testimony shall be taken under this resolution in relation to the qualification, election, or return of any member of the Indiana legislature,"

It was determined in the affirmative.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

On motion by Mr. Wilson further to amend the resolution by striking out the words "any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana" and inserting:

"The Hon. Oliver H. Smith, the Hon. John Pettit, and the Hon. John D. Defrees, who are hereby appointed commissioners for that purpose,"

It was determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. Fessenden to amend the resolution by striking out the words "the supreme or circuit courts" and inserting "any court of record," it was determined in the negative.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted to their seats from the State of Indiana, the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis: Provided, That the proofs to be taken shall be returned to the Senate of the United States within ninety days from the passage of this resolution: And provided, That no testimony shall be taken under this resolution in relation to the qualification, election, or return of any member of the Indiana legislature."

MONDAY, April 19, 1858.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following motion; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate furnish, on application by any individual desiring to possess the same, an authenticated copy of the resolution agreed to on the 16th of February, 1858, authorizing testimony to be taken in reference to the election of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as Senators from the State of Indiana.

[Brief remarks on the resolution are found on pages 1658, 1659 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 1st sess. 35th Cong.]

SATURDAY, May 15, 1858.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate testimony in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as Senators of the United States from the State of Indiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TUESDAY, May 18, 1858.

Mr. Bright presented affidavits of C. K. Drew, R. D. Slater, and W. J. Cullen, evidence in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as Senators from the State of Indiana, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONDAY, May 24, 1858.

Mr. Pugh, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, Senators from the State of Indiana, together with the documents and testimony relative to that subject, submitted a report (No. 275), accompanied by the following resolution. [For resolution see report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Bayard (chairman), Sebastian, Pugh, Benjamin, Green, Collamer, and Trumbull.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, Senators from the State of Indiana, together with the documents and testimony relative to that subject, have had the same under consideration, and report, by resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted

* The testimony accompanying this report may be found in Senate Reports, 1st sess. 35th Cong., vol. 2, Report No. 275. This is the fourth report made by the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of Mr. Fitch, and the second one to include the credentials of Mr. Bright.

from the State of Indiana, are entitled to the seats which they now hold in the Senate as such Senators aforesaid, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials.

[Some remarks by members of the committee, asking for an opportunity to examine the report before it is printed, are found on pages 2353, 2354 of the Congressional Globe, part 3, 1st sess. 35th Cong.]

MONDAY, June 7, 1858.

Mr. Pugh presented an affidavit of John W. Blake, relative to the election of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as Senators in Congress from the State of Indiana.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

THURSDAY, June 10, 1858.

On motion by Mr. Bright, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, Senators from the State of Indiana, entitled to their seats in the Senate; and,

On motion by Mr. Bright,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

[A brief debate on the postponement of the consideration of the resolution is found on page 2876 of the Congressional Globe, part 3, 1st sess. 35th Cong.]

FRIDAY, June 11, 1858.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, Senators in Congress from the State of Indiana, entitled to their seats in the Senate; and,

An amendment being proposed by Mr. Hamlin,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull to amend the proposed amendment,

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

[An extended debate on the adoption of the resolution is found on pages 2923–2949 of the Congressional Globe, part 3, 1st sess. 35th Cong.]

SATURDAY, June 12, 1858.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring the Hon. Jesse D. Bright and the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, Senators in Congress from the State of Indiana, entitled to their seats in the Senate.

A motion was made by Mr. Hamlin to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting:

"That the case of Jesse D. Bright and Graham N. Fitch be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report specially the grounds on which the resolution is based declaring said Bright and Fitch elected."

On motion by Mr. Trumbull to amend the proposed amendment by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting "in the opinion of the Senate, no election of a member of this body made by the legislature of a State consisting of two branches is valid, when made in a meeting of individual members of both, unless such meeting for that purpose was prescribed by law, or had been previously agreed to by each house acting separately in its organized capacity, or is participated in by a majority of the members of each house, or is subsequently ratified in some form by each house in its organized capacity," it was determined in the negative—yeas 17, nays 26.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Iverson, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee.

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Hamlin, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 34.

On motion by Mr. Fessenden, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "are" and before the word "entitled" the word "not," it was determined in the negative—yeas 23, nays 30.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Mason, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Sildell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee.

No further amendment being proposed, the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was then agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted from the State of Indiana, are entitled to the seats which they now hold in the Senate as such Senators aforesaid, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials."

[No debate took place this day.]

[Second session of the Thirty-fifth Congress.]

Credentials of Henry S. Lane and William Monroe McCarty.

MONDAY, January 24, 1859.

The Vice-President presented a memorial of the State of Indiana, by its senators and representatives in general convention assembled, representing that it is the wish and desire of the State that the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. William Monroe McCarty be admitted to seats in the Senate of the United States as the only legally elected and constitutionally chosen Senators of the State of Indiana; which was read.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and be printed.

[The memorial is printed on pages 534, 535 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 35th Cong.]

Mr. Seward submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. William M. McCarty, who claim to have been elected Senators from the State of Indiana, be entitled to the privileges of admission on the floor of the Senate until their claims shall have been decided."

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1859.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted by him the 24th instant, to admit the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. W. M. McCarty, claiming to have been elected Senators by the legislature of Indiana, on the floor of the Senate; and

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Iverson that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allen, Bates, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chesnut, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Ward.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull Wade, and Wilson.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

FRIDAY, January 28, 1858.

Mr. Douglas presented a certified copy of that portion of the journal of the senate of the State of Indiana of the 22d of December, 1858, also a certified copy of that portion of the journal of the house of representatives of the State of Indiana of the 22d of December, 1858, relating to the election of United States Senators; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1859.

Mr. Bayard, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a memorial of the State of Indiana, by her senators and representatives in general convention assembled, requesting that the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. William Monroe McCarty be admitted to seats in the Senate of the United States as the only legally elected and constitutionally chosen Senators of that State; also certified copies of the proceedings of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Indiana of the 22d of December, 1858, relative to the election of United States Senators, submitted a report, asking that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the legislature of Indiana.

On motion by Mr. Bayard,

Ordered, That the report lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. Collamer submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject; which were ordered to be printed.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Seward submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Henry S. Lane and William M. McCarty have leave to occupy seats on the floor of the Senate pending the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of the legislature of Indiana declaring them her duly elected Senators, and that they have leave to speak to the merits of their right to seats and the report of the committee."

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Bayard (chairman), Pugh, Benjamin, Green, Clingman, Collamer, and Trumbull.]

Mr. Bayard submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of the State of Indiana, by her representatives and senators in general convention assembled, representing that it is her wish and desire that the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. William Monroe McCarty be admitted to seats in the Senate of the United States as the only legally elected and constitutionally chosen Senators of that State, submit the following report:

That the Hon. Graham N. Fitch, on the 9th day of February, 1857, was admitted by the Senate on the customary prima facie evidence of his election as a Senator from the State of Indiana, to serve as such until the 4th day of March, A. D. 1861; was qualified and took his seat as a Senator. On the same day resolutions of the senate of Indiana adverse to the legality of his election and a protest of certain members of the house of representatives of the same State against the validity of the election were presented to the Senate; and the credentials of Mr. Fitch, the resolutions of the senate of Indiana, and the protest of the members of the house of representatives against the validity of the election were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The committee on the 26th of February reported a resolution authorizing testimony to be taken both by the sitting members and the protestants in relation to all matters of fact contained in their respective allegations. This report was ordered to lie upon the table on the 2d of March, 1857, and no further action was had upon the subject during that session. At the called session of the Senate the papers on file relating to the election of Mr. Fitch, were on the 9th of March 1857, on motion of Mr. Trumbull referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on the 14th of March the committee reported a resolution authorizing testimony to be taken—slightly variant from the resolution reported at the preceding session. The resolution was on the same day ordered to lie on the table. The credentials of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, elected a Senator from the State of Indiana, to serve as such until the 4th day of March, 1863, were presented to the Senate and read on the 2d day of March, 1857; and at the called session of the Senate, on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1857, Mr. Bright was qualified and took his seat. At the first session of the present Congress, on the 17th of December, 1858, on motion of Mr. Trumbull, the credentials of the sitting members from Indiana, together with all papers on file protesting against their right to seats, or relating to their election as Senators in Congress by the legislature of Indiana, were referred by the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary. On the 21st of January, 1858, the committee made a report, concluding with a resolution similar to the resolution which had previously been reported in relation to the case of Mr. Fitch, authorizing testimony to be taken; and on the 25th of the same month Mr. Trumbull submitted the views of the minority of the committee.

Both the report of the committee and the views of the minority were printed and are appended as part of this report, with a view to the illustration of the questions presented to the Senate, upon which its decision was subsequently made.

On the 16th of February, 1858, the consideration of the resolution reported by the committee was resumed, and, after the rejection of some proposed amendments and the adoption of others, the following resolution was passed by the Senate:

"Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted to their seats from the State of Indiana, the sitting members and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members touching all matters of fact therein contained before any judge of the district court of the United States or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis: Provided, That the proofs to be taken shall be returned to the Senate of the United States within ninety days from the passage of this resolution: And provided, That no testimony shall be taken under this resolution in relation to the qualification, election, or return of any member of the Indiana legislature."

Testimony was subsequently taken by the protestants, which was, together with certain affidavits presented on behalf of the sitting members and documentary evidence referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on the 24th day of May, 1858, Mr. Pugh from that committee reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright, Senators returned and admitted from the State of Indiana, are entitled to the seats which they now hold in the Senate as such Senators aforesaid, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials."

This resolution and the accompanying documents were on the same day ordered to be printed.

The resolution was under consideration in the Senate, and fully debated at several subsequent times, and was finally, after the rejection of several proposed amendments, passed by the Senate without amendment or alteration. In the opinion of the committee, this resolution (no motion having been made to reconsider it) finally disposed of all questions presented to the Senate involving the respective rights of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright to their seats in the Senate, as Senators from the State of Indiana for the terms stated in the resolution. It appears by the memorial that the legislature of Indiana, at its recent session in December last, assumed the power of revising the final decision thus made by the Senate of the United States under its unquestioned and undoubted constitutional authority to "be the judge of the qualifications of its own members." Under this assumption, it also appears by the journals of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Indiana, the legislature of Indiana, treating the seats of the Senators from that State as vacant, proceeded, subsequently, by a concurrent vote of the senate and house of representatives of the State, to elect the Hon. Henry S. Lane as a Senator of the United States for the State of Indiana, to serve as such until the 4th of March, 1863, and the Hon. William Monroe McCarty as a Senator for the same State, to serve as such until the 4th of March, A. D. 1861. Under this action of the legislature of Indiana those gentlemen now claim their seats in the Senate of the United States.

It may be conceded that the election would have been valid, and the claimants entitled to their seats, had the legislature of Indiana possessed the authority to revise the decision of the Senate of the United States that Messrs. Fitch and Bright had been duly elected Senators from Indiana, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863.

In the opinion of the committee, however, no such authority existed in the legislature of Indiana. There was no vacancy in the representation of that State in the Senate; and the decision of the Senate, made on the 12th of June, 1858, established finally and (in the absence of a motion to reconsider) irreversibly the right of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as a Senator of the State of Indiana until the 4th of March, 1861, and the right of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright as a Senator from the same State until the 4th of March, A. D. 1863

The decision was made by an authority having exclusive jurisdiction of the subject; was judicial in its nature; and, being made on a contest in which all the facts and questions of law involving the validity of the election of Messrs. Fitch and Bright, and their respective rights to their seats, were as fully known and presented to the Senate as they are now in the memorial of the legislature of Indiana, the judgment of the Senate then rendered is final, and precludes further inquiry into the subject to which it relates.

There being, by the decision of the Senate, no vacancy from the State of Indiana in the Senate of the United States, the election held by the legislature of that State at its recent session is, in the opinion of the committee, a nullity, and merely void, and confers no rights upon the persons it assumed to elect as Senators of the United States.

The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the legislature of Indiana.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.*

Mr. Collamer submitted the following views of the minority:

The power of the Senate to judge of the election and qualification of its own members is unlimited and abiding. It is not exhausted in any particular case by once adjudicating the same, as the power of re-examination and the correction of error or mistake incident to all judicial tribunals and proceedings remains with the Senate in this respect, as well to do justice to itself as to the States represented or to the persons claiming or holding seats. Such an abiding power must exist, to purge the body from intruders, otherwise any one might retain his seat who had once wrongly procured a decision of the Senate in his favor by fraud or falsehood, or even by papers forged or fabricated.

In what cases and at whose application a rehearing will at all times be granted is not now necessary to inquire; but when new parties, with apparently legal claim, apply, and especially when a sovereign State, by its legislature, makes respectful application to be represented by persons in the Senate legally elected, and insists that the sitting members from that State were never legally chosen, we consider that the subject should be fully re-examined, and that neither the State, the legislature, or the persons now claiming seats can legally or justly be estopped, or even prejudiced, by any former proceedings of the Senate to which they were not parties.

At the first session of the legislature of Indiana after the present sitting members were declared by the Senate as entitled to their seats, and at the earliest time it could take action, it declared their pretended election as inoperative and void, and that the State was infact unrepresented; and they proceeded to elect H. S. Lane and William M. McCarty as Senators of the United States for said State, according to the Constitution of the United States; and they send here their memorial, alleging that the present sitting members were never legally elected; and they show facts, in addition to what was heretofore presented to the Senate, tending, as they consider, to sustain this allegation. The said Lane and McCarty present their certificates and claim their seats. We consider the matters stated in said memorial as true. The said Lane and McCarty have presented their brief sustaining their claim to seats, which is in the words following:

Brief of W. M. McCarty and Henry S. Lane, submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

The State is entitled to the office. The legislature is her supreme instrument and donee of the power to elect Senators. It is the creature of the constitution, which is the chart of its power, vested only in two co-ordinate branches; a quorum of two-thirds of the members is requisite to give either a legal entity; each is equivalent in power, with an absolute veto on the power of the other.

The legislature is a corporation aggregate, with only such power as its creator has seen fit to endow it with, to be exercised in conformity to the laws of its birth.

To the joint wisdom and counsel of these colleges is the legislative power intrusted. It is not parceled out to its component elements in integrals, neither is it vested in an amalgamated body of the two. The one is erected as a barrier to the other. The ordeal of both must be passed. This guaranty against abuse cannot be broken down without destroying one of the safeguards of our Government. The sovereign voice is an unit. The power that utters it is an entirety—an invisible, intangible, artificial person. The power is in the organism called "the general assembly," and not in the individual members. It is not the rights or powers of the members, but the delegated trust powers of the State that are wielded in senatorial elections or other exercises of legislative powers. Without a quorum of either house it did not exist—without either, the legislature did not exist, and without a legislature no election would be had.

Now, the facts are that a quorum of neither house was present at the pretended election of Messrs. Bright and Fitch, nor even a majority of the senate, nor did either house prescribe the time, place, or manner of electing.

It is of the essence of legislative power that its exercise shall be free from all restraint; each body free to deliberate and act in its duties; each entitled to its full powers. The facts are that the senate, upon eight occasions, refused to go into joint convention with the house, and at no time consented. She could not be compelled to merge her individuality, or surrender her veto power, or adopt the joint-vote mode of electing Senators; or, in other words, dilute or annihilate her power, upon the mandate of the house, as that would degrade her from an equal to an inferior. On the contrary she had the right to determine the time, place, and manner, and did do it by resolution, to elect by separate vote, at a proper time, in which the house never concurred. Where diverse duties are imposed, she must determine which are most imperative and shall have priority.

The constitution of Indiana only provides for a joint convention upon the contingency of a tie vote for governor and lieutenant-governor. That contingency did not exist; therefore the convention did not. To say that a duty to form a joint convention creates it is as absurd as to say that the subpœna of a witness works his presence, or the commands of the decalogue their observance.

Failing to get the senate into a joint convention, a false record of that pretended fact was made, to be used as evidence, and which has been used as veritable and true, and the absolute verity and the unimpeachable quality of a record claimed for the fabrication.

The resolves of the senate are those of the whole body. The mutinous senators who usurped the name and power of the senate in said pretended convention were subject to arrest by order of that body for absence, and the attempt to nullify the will of the majority by attempting a business at a time, place, and in a manner vetoed by that body by a resolve, then unvacated and unrescinded. Said convention, if it existed, expired with the duty that called it into life. The president of the senate, when inaugurated governor, his office as president of the senate expired, and with it that of his deputy president. The president not only usurped the power to appoint a clerk—an office not known to the law and void—who only authenticated this pretended election by interpolating it into the journal of the house. This president, whose power expired with that of his creator, arrogated that of adjourning it to a fixed day; in other words, commanding it to obey his arbitrary rescript; and, at a subsequent one, the more imperious mandate commanded them to elect Senators, no agreement whatever having been had by the house therefor as to time, place, and manner.

We aver that not only did no usage exist in Indiana, but that in no solitary instance was an election had without the consent of both houses, fixing time, place, &c., by law or resolution. While said pretended convention was in existence, but adjourned to a fixed day, numerous attempts were made in both houses to create one by the members who voted for Messrs. Bright and Fitch; thus offering evidence that they did not consider that one had been formed and was in existence. No forced convention could be had. Mutual consent was necessary, and it was never had by a vote, which is the only mode of altering the will of a legislative body.

The history of joint conventions in Indiana will also show that no other business was ever transacted than that for which it was specially convened. And we insist that the validity of the acts of a joint convention is due to the separate action of the two houses as the general assembly. It is also necessary to the validity of all elections by corporate bodies that notice be given of the time, &c., and the journals of neither house show any such notice or any conventional agreement for the same.

Upon the facts and law above no legal election could have been had.

To sustain the title of Messrs. Bright and Fitch, the constitution of Indiana, depositing her legislative power in two co-ordinate houses, must be broken down—that which requires two-thirds of the members to exercise any of her attributes of sovereignty, and that one house cannot coerce the other. Not only is this election in defiance of these injunctions, but in the face of a positive dissent by one branch, armed by the people with an absolute veto. But a presiding officer, who is no part of the legislature, usurped the powers and prerogatives of the legislature; all the forms and guarantees with which the people hedged in their legislative servant were disregarded, and it is claimed that the act is as valid as if they had been observed.

To sustain Messrs. Bright and Fitch the constitution of Indiana is made a dead letter. Will the Senate, the peculiar guardians of State rights, reared up for that especial purpose, exclude Indiana from her weight and voice in it by instruments empowered by her? Will she be allowed to interpret her own constitution and acts, or will the Senate, under any pretense, blot her out of the confederacy, and realize all those fears portrayed by some of the framers of the Constitution by an absorbtion of and encroachment upon State rights?

The legislative power enshrines and protects all rights subject to its jurisdiction. Prior to the confederation the several States owed this duty to their citizens. They did not surrender it, but intrusted it to the Federal for their better protection with the right guaranteed them of a voice in the Senate, as a means of enforcing this duty through the Federal instrument.

We deny that under a constitutional grant of power, with prescribed modes of its exhibition, that you can discriminate between elections and laws. The selection of a general, upon whose skill the fate of an army or the country may depend, or of a judge upon whose legal attainments and integrity the lives, liberties, and property of the citizen may depend, is of less moment than some petty law.

The same power is as requisite to the creation of the one as the other.

But it may be said that this question is res adjudicata.

We deny that our rights or title are barred by a decision had before they were created.

We deny that the judicial power of the Senate is capable of self-exhaustion. We deny that the political right of the State is capable of annihilation without annihilating the Constitution which creates the right.

We insist that the right to judge of the election and qualification of members must continue while the term continues.

The qualifications are continuing conditions of title.

We deny that courts are ever estopped by their own action.

We deny that sovereigns are estopped.

We deny that Indiana was, prior to this time, a party to the proceedings of the Senate, or had opportunity to allege or elicit the true facts.

We deny the power of the Senate, under the power to judge, to create Senators for Indiana.

We claim for her a superior knowledge of her own acts and grants.

We insist that the simple admission of a Senator to his seat upon credentials is a decision, and that it was never pretended this precluded his ouster if his title were not good.

If the Senate have not power to exclude foreign elements at all times, it is not equal to the duties intrusted to its guardianship.

And we will not believe that the Senate is the only tribunal on earth whose wrongs, once done, are eternal and irrevocable.

W. M. McCARTY.
H. S. LANE.

In the case of the State of Mississippi, in the House of Representatives in the Twenty-fifth Congress, the power to re-examine a decision made on an election of members was fully considered and decided. Gohlston and Claiborne were, at a special election held on the proclamation of the governor, chosen representatives from that State to a special session of Congress, called by the President. At that session exception was taken to them, but after some objection they were admitted to their seats. Their case and papers were referred to the Committee on Elections, who made report, and thereupon, on full and elaborate discussion, it was resolved that they were duly elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and entitled to their seats. This was in September. In November following an election was holden in said State, and Prentiss and Ward were elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, who, in December following, presented their credentials and claimed their seats. It was then insisted in that case, as it now is in this, that the decision so before made was conclusive of the right of Claiborne and Gohlston to their seats as members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and the whole matter was "res adjudicata." But on full examination and after full discussion, the former resolution declaring said Caliborne and Gohlston as duly elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress was rescinded.

We are therefore of opinion that the memorial of the legislature of Indiana should be duly entertained and considered, and the said Lane and McCarty fully heard; and that if on full examination and hearing the Senate find that the present sitting members were not duly elected, the resolution declaring them elected should be reconsidered. And if the Senate find that the said Lane and McCarty were legally elected they should be admitted to their seats.

THURSDAY, February 10, 1859.

On motion by Mr. Bayard, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of the legislature of Indiana asking that the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. William M. McCarty be admitted to seats in the Senate of the United States, as Senators duly elected by that legislature; and,

On motion by Mr. Bayard,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted by him the 3d instant, to admit the Hon. Henry S. Lane and the Hon. William M. McCarty to seats on the floor of the Senate during the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to their election, and to permit them to speak on the merits of their rights to seats in the Senate; and,

On motion by Mr. Seward,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

* * * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Seward to postpone all prior orders to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of the State of Indiana in relation to the representation of that State in the Senate of the United States, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Foot, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Allen, Bates, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, and Ward.

So the motion was not agreed to.

FRIDAY, February 11, 1859.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of the State of Indiana, relating to the Senators of that State, viz, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

An amendment being submitted by Mr. Seward, and an amendment to that amendment being proposed by Mr. Pugh,

While Mr. Seward was engaged in debate a question was raised, at 1 o'clock, by Mr. Iverson, whether the special order of the day (S. 497), being the unfinished business of yesterday, was not entitled to precedence.

The Vice-President decided that Mr. Seward was still entitled to the floor, on a privileged question.

On motion by Mr. Pugh that the report of the committee, with the pending amendments, lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chesnut, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, and Ward.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bates, Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

[A short debate is found on pages 957–959 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 35th Cong.]

MONDAY, February 14, 1859.

On motion by Mr. Collamer, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of the State of Indiana in relation to the Senators from Indiana, with the reported resolution, that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the legislature of Indiana.

An amendment having been proposed by Mr. Seward, to amend the resolution to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary by striking out all after "resolved" and inserting,

"That Henry S. Lane and William M. McCarty have leave to occupy seats on the floor of the Senate pending the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of the legislature of Indiana declaring them her duly elected Senators, and that they have leave to speak to the merits of their rights to seats and on the report of the committee,"

On motion by Mr. Pugh to amend the amendment proposed by Mr. Seward, by striking out all after "that" and inserting "the resolution of the Senate, adopted June 12, 1858, affirming the right of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright as Senators elected from the State of Indiana, the former until the 4th day of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th day of March, 1863, was a final decision of all the premises then in controversy, and conclusive as well upon the legislature of Indiana, and all persons claiming under its authority, as upon the Senators named in the resolution."

On motion by Mr. Harlan "That all the papers in this case be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to inquire whether Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright or Henry S. Lane and W. M. McCarty, or any one of them, has been elected to the office of Senator of the United States from the State of Indiana as provided by the Constitution of the United States, and in accordance with the laws and usages of the State of Indiana, and report the facts connected with and bearing on the supposed election of each to the Senate, and that the contestants be allowed to appear at the bar of the Senate when such report shall be made and argue their right to seats,"

After debate,

A division of the motion made by Mr. Harlan was called for by Mr. Stuart; and the question being taken on the first division, viz, "That all the papers in this case be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary," it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 32.

On motion by Mr. Pugh, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Trumbull, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Chesnut, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Lane, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Shields, Slidell, Smith, Stuart, Toombs, and Ward.

So the motion to recommit with instructions was disagreed to.

The question recurring on agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. Pugh to the amendment proposed by Mr. Seward, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 16.

On motion by Mr. Seward, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chesnut, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Lane, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Shields, Slidell, Smith, Stuart, Toombs, and Ward.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Trumbull, and Wilson.

On the question to agree to the amendment of Mr. Seward, as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 16.

On motion by Mr. King, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chesnut, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Lane, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Shields, Slidell, Smith, Stuart, Toombs, and Ward.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Trumbull, and Wilson.

On the question to agree to the resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary, amended, as follows:

"Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the State of Indiana, and that the resolution of the Senate adopted June 12, 1858, affirming the right of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright as Senators elected from the State of Indiana, the former until the 4th day of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th day of March, 1863, was a final decision of all the premises then in controversy, and conclusive, as well upon the legislature of Indiana, and all persons claiming under its authority, as upon the Senators named in the resolution,"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 15.

On motion by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chesnut, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Lane, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Shields, Slidell, Smith, Stuart, Toombs, and Ward.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Trumbull, and Wilson.

So the reported resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

[The debates are found on pages 1014–1019 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 35th Cong., and on pages 128–148 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 35th Cong.]

[Special session of Senate, March, 1857.]

SIMON CAMERON,

Senator from Pennsylvania from March 17, 1845, till March 3, 1849; from March 4, 1857, till he resigned in March, 1861; and from March 4, 1867, till he resigned in March, 1877.

Soon after Mr. Cameron had taken his seat in the Senate for the term beginning March 4, 1857, a protest against the legality of his election by certain members of the legislature of Pennsylvania was presented to the Senate. The subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee reported that the grounds of the protest were (1) that there was not a concurrent majority of each house in favor of Mr. Cameron; (2) that the State senate did not comply in certain particulars with an act of the State regulating the election of Senators; and (3) that the election was procured "by corrupt and unlawful means." The committee reported in regard to the first ground of the protest that it was "untenable under the statute of Pennsylvania and the uniform practical construction of the Federal Constitution for the last half century;" in regard to the second ground of the protest they reported that the provisions of law alleged to have been disregarded were purely directory, and that a failure to comply with them would not vitiate an election; and in regard to the third ground of the protest, reported that the "allegation was entirely too vague and indefinite" to justify the recommendation of an investigation by the United States Senate. The report ended with the resolution that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. The minority of the committee concurred with the majority in reference to the two first points, but submitted a report dissenting from the conclusion of the majority in regard to the third point, on the ground that when a protest of this nature comes from a responsible source the Senate should investigate the charges and allow the persons protesting an opportunity of submitting the proof upon which the charges rest. After a brief debate the resolution reported by the committee was adopted.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856–'57, and the report of the committee in the case from Senate Reports, 3d sess. 34th Cong., Report No. 1 of the special session.

The debates in the case are found within pages 387–391 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 34th Cong., 1856–'57.

Special references to the debate of each day are inserted below.

FRIDAY, January 16, 1857.

The President pro tempore presented the credentials of the Hon. Simon Cameron, elected a Senator by the legislature of Pennsylvania for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March next; which were read.

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1857.

The oath prescribed by law was administered to Simon Cameron, and he took his seat in the Senate.

FRIDAY, March 6, 1857.

Mr. Bigler presented a protest of fifty-four members of the house of representatives, and a protest of fifteen members of the senate of the State of Pennsylvania against the proceedings under which the Hon. Simon Cameron claims to represent the State in the Senate of the United States from the 4th of March, 1857.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

MONDAY, March 9, 1857.

On motion by Mr. Cameron,

Ordered, That the protest of certain members of the house of representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, and the protest of members of the senate of the said State, presented the 6th of March, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1857.

Mr. Benjamin, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred a protest of members of the senate, and a protest of members of the house of representatives of the State of Pennsylvania against the election of the Hon. Simon Cameron as a Senator in Congress, submitted a report (No. 1), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. Pugh submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary on the same subject; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

Mr. Foot submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Simon Cameron is entitled to a seat upon this floor as a legally chosen Senator from the State of Pennsylvania."

[The debate is found on pages 388, 389 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Butler (chairman), Bayard, Toombs, Pugh, Benjamin, Collamer, and Trumbull.]

Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the protests of certain members of the legislature of Pennsylvania against the election of the Hon. Simon Cameron as a Senator in Congress.

MARCH 11, 1857.—Submitted, and ordered to be printed with the views of the minority of the committee.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the protest of certain members of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, alleging certain irregularities and illegalities in the election of the Hon. Simon Cameron, a Senator from said State, report:

That the grounds of protest are stated as follows, viz:

First. That there was not a concurrent majority of each house in favor of the candidate declared to be elected.

Second. That the senate did not comply with the requirements of the act of 2d July, 1839, by appointing a teller and making a nomination of persons to fill said office, and giving notice of said appointment and nomination at least one day previous to the meeting of said convention.

In addition to the two grounds aforesaid, the protest presented by the members of the house of representatives charges,

Third. "That the election of the said Simon Cameron was procured, as they are informed and believe, by corrupt and unlawful means, influencing the action and votes of certain members of the house of representatives of this State; and they request that an investigation be ordered by your honorable body, not only into the regularity of the said election, but into the charges herein presented, in order that an opportunity may be afforded of submitting the proof upon which they rest."

In relation to the first two grounds of protest, the committee are unanimously of opinion that no facts are presented tending in the slightest degree to impair the validity of the election of Mr. Cameron.

It is true that the law of Pennsylvania on the subject of the election of Senators requires that each branch of the legislature shall appoint one teller and nominate at least one person to fill such office, and communicate to the other house the names of the persons so appointed and nominated at least one day previous to the joint meeting; but the same law also provides that at the hour of twelve, on the second Tuesday in January next preceding the expiration of the constitutional term of a Senator, the members of both houses shall meet in convention in the chamber of the house of representatives and choose a Senator viva voce from the persons so nominated as aforesaid; and also expressly provides that the person who shall receive the votes of a majority of the members present shall be declared duly elected.

From the extracts furnished by the protesting parties, taken from the journals of the two houses, it appears that the two houses did meet in joint convention on the day and at the place appointed by law, and in accordance with resolutions passed in each house separately, and that one hundred and thirty-three members, composing the entire legislature of Pennsylvania, were present and voted, and that Simon Cameron received 67 votes, and 66 votes were given for all the other candidates; and that Simon Cameron, having thus obtained a majority of the votes of all the members present, was declared duly elected Senator.

It appears from the journal of the senate that the appointment of a teller and the nomination of candidates, and the communication to the other house of the appointment and nomination so made, all took place on the day of the election, instead of one day previous to the election, as required by the law of the State; but your committee regard this provision of law as purely directory in its nature, and are of opinion that a failure to comply with this formality would under no circumstances suffice to vitiate an election otherwise legal and valid; but where, as in the present case, both houses proceeded without objection from any source to perform their constitutional duty of electing a Senator, the necessity of complying with any particular forms required by law may fairly be considered as waived by common consent, and it is entirely too late, after the result of the voting has been ascertained, to raise a question as to the mode of proceeding.

The objection that there was not a concurrent majority of each house in favor of the candidate declared to be elected is equally untenable under the statute of Pennsylvania, and the uniform practical construction of the Federal Constitution for the last half century.

The third ground of protest is signed by members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, but not by the members of the senate of that State.

It is a general allegation "that the election of the said Simon Cameron was procured, as they are informed and believe, by corrupt and unlawful means, influencing the action and votes of certain members of the house of representatives," and the Senate of the United States is asked to investigate the charge.

The committee cannot recommend that this prayer be granted. The allegation is entirely too vague and indefinite to justify such a recommendation. Not a single fact or circumstance is detailed as a basis for the general charge. Neither the nature of the means alleged to be corrupt and unlawful, nor the time, place, or manner of using them, is set forth, nor is it even alleged that the sitting member participated in the use of such corrupt means or, indeed, had any knowledge of their existence. Under no state of facts could your committee deem it consistent with propriety, or with the dignity of this body, to send out a roving commission in search of proofs of fraud in order to deprive one of its members of a seat to which he is, prima facie, entitled; still less can they recommend such a course when the parties alleging the fraud and corruption are themselves armed with ample powers for investigation. If it be, indeed, true that members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania have been influenced by corrupt considerations or unlawful appliances, the means of investigation and redress are in the power of the very parties who seek the aid of the Senate of the United States. Let their complaint be made to the house of which they are members, and which is the tribunal peculiarly appropriate for conducting the desired investigation. That their complaint will meet the respectful consideration of that house your committee are not permitted to doubt. If upon such investigation the facts charged are proven, and if they in any manner involve the character of the recently elected member of this body from the State of Pennsylvania, the Constitution of the United States has not left the Senate without ample means for protecting itself against the presence of unworthy members in its midst.

In the mean time your committee see no reason for initiating any proceeding on the subject, and submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, dissents from the conclusion at which his colleagues have arrived in reference to the contested election of a Senator for the State of Pennsylvania.

In the protest submitted by forty-four members of the house of representatives in that State will be found an allegation in these words:

"The undersigned further charge that the election of the said Simon Cameron was procured, as they are informed and believe, by corrupt and unlawful means influencing the action and votes of certain members of the house of representatives in this State; and they request that an investigation be ordered by your honorable body, not only into the regularity of the said election, but into the charges herein presented, in order that an opportunity may be afforded of submitting the proof upon which they rest."

It is objected by the majority of the committee that this paragraph does not specifically relate the facts on which a charge of corruption can be predicated.

If the case were only between contestor and contestee, as individuals, there might be some force in the objection; but it is one in which a number of the qualified electors, themselves public agents, inform the Senate that corrupt as well as unlawful means have been used in the election.

The accusation comes from a responsible source, and is too serious, too distinctly and directly made, to be treated with indifference. It concerns the honor of the Senate and the security of the Government that no rule of merely technical character, applicable as between individuals, should prevent a thorough investigation of the case. This would seem to be a duty the more imperative in view of the statute, enacted at the late session, in which very stringent and unusual provisions have been made for the detection of corrupt practices by members of Congress.

The undersigned concurs with the majority in reference to the other points of contest.

G. E. PUGH.

FRIDAY, March 13, 1857.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the protests of certain senators and members of the house of representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, against the election of the Hon. Simon Cameron as a Senator in Congress from that State; and, in concurrence therewith,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Foot, on his motion, obtained leave to withdraw the resolution, submitted by him the 11th instant, respecting the right of the Hon. Simon Cameron to a seat in the Senate.

[The debate that took place on the adoption of the resolution is found on page 391 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

[Thirty-fifth Congress—First session.]

JAMES SHIELDS,

Senator from Minnesota from May 12, 1858, till March 3, 1859.

February 26, 1857, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to authorize the people of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." The constitution, when formed, having been referred to the Committee on Territories, that committee reported a bill January 26, 1858, entitled "A bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union," which was approved May 11, 1858. February 25, 1858, a paper purporting to be the credentials of Mr. Shields as a Senator from the State of Minnesota, and a letter from him setting forth the grounds upon which he claimed a right to a seat in the Senate, were presented. He claimed that Minnesota was at that time a State by virtue of the act of February 26, 1857; that that act enabled her on certain terms and conditions to be at once a State; that she had performed those conditions. March 4, 1858, the committee unanimously reported a resolution that Minnesota was not a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws, the grounds on which the resolution was based not being given. No action was taken on the resolution. Mr. Shields was admitted to the seat after the bill admitting the State was approved. It appears from the debates which took place on the question whether the subject was a privileged question, that some Senators thought Mr. Shields entitled to the seat for the reasons given in his letter; that some thought that no act of admission would have been necessary if the Territory had complied with the conditions of the enabling act, but that it had not done so; that others thought that an act of admission was essential even if the conditions of the enabling act had been complied with. Extracts from speeches will show more at length the grounds upon which different Senators proceeded.

May 12, 1858, the day on which the Minnesota Senators were sworn, a debate arose on the question whether the Senators were duly elected in December, 1857, or whether an election must take place after the passage of the act of admission. This debate is found on pages 2076, 2077 of the Congressional Globe, part 3, 1st sess. 35th Cong. There was no division of the Senate on the question.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 1st sess. 35th Cong.; the report of the committee, from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 35th Cong., vol. 1, No. 104; the letter of Mr. Shields, from the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 35th Cong., part 1, pages 861, 862, and extracts from speeches from the same volume of the Globe.

The debates in the case are found on pages 861–867 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 35th Cong.

LETTER OF MR. SHIELDS.

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1858.

SIR: I beg leave to offer a few reasons to show that Minnesota is one of the sovereign States of this Union. My first proposition is, that there are only two forms of political organization under which a community of American citizens can legitimately exist within the jurisdiction and under the Constitution of the United States. The one is the organization of a Territory of the Union; the other, that of a State of the Union. These are the only determinate shapes into which political communities can be molded under our Constitution. Each has its appropriate place in our federal system. A community of American citizens living under a territorial organization is in direct and legitimate connection with the Federal Government. That same community, transformed into a State, is also in direct legitimate connection with the Federal Government. In the transition from a Territory to a State, there is no point of time at which this connection can by any possibility be broken. The territorial government continues in full force until it is superseded by a State government; and whenever the people constitute themselves lawfully into a State, it is, Io instanti, a State of the Union. There is no such political anomaly as a State out of the Union, or not yet in the Union. These erroneous terms have been applied so vaguely to communities whose condition is not easily determined that the public begin to think there must be some intermediate provisional, probationary state, in which communities are sometimes kept on their passage from the condition of Territories to that of sovereign States of the Union. California was denominated, not many years ago, a State out of the Union. Minnesota is, I suppose, at present considered by some a State not yet in the Union, or, perhaps, a provisional State. Certainly the representatives of Minnesota are at present in a provisional dilemma, not knowing whether they represent a State in the Union or out of the Union.

I now beg leave to refer you to the law of 1857 authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a State government. The first section contains the following language: "The inhabitants of Minnesota are hereby authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of Minnesota, and to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, according to the Federal Constitution." Here the authority is absolute and unconditional, first, to form a constitution and State government; secondly, to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; authority to make a State and authority to come into the Union. No language could be more positive; no authority could be more plenary; no act could be more determinate. The people have performed their engagements in good faith, and they have a right to expect a like compliance on the part of Congress. These engagements, too, affect the most sacred of all political rights—the constitutional rights of a sovereign State. The third section of the Minnesota enabling act strengthens and corroborates this position. It provides that a convention of delegates shall assemble at the capital of said Territory on the second Monday of July next (1857), and first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union "at that time." Mark the language: not thereafter; not upon the happening of any future contingency; but "at that time," to wit, on the second Monday in July, 1857; "and if so," that is, if they shall so determine, "shall proceed to form a constitution, and to take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State."

Here two things are to be specially observed: first, the determination to become a State at that time; not the determination at that time to become a State, but a State at that time. Second, the submission to the approval and ratification of the people. When was Minnesota to become a State? At that time. How was her constitution to be ratified? By submission to the people. She has complied with every requirement. She entered the Union at the time prescribed; her constitution is ratified in the manner prescribed; and yet she is now as completely postponed and ignored as if she had disregarded all her obligations. Permit me to cite two precedents, which, I hope, will prove conclusive in this case. In 1802 an enabling act was passed for Ohio somewhat similar to, but not so decisive as, the Minnesota act. The authority given was to form a constitution and State government; and then follows this language: "The State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union on the same footing with the original States." This was then considered an authorized admission of the State, and the only act of admission that ever took place in the case of Ohio; and that State is now in the Union under and by virtue of the authority of that enabling act.

The enabling act in the case of Indiana contains the following language: "The State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union." Mark the difference in the two acts. In the case of Minnesota authority is given to come in at the present time. In the case of Indiana a promise is given for her admission at some future time; under the law Indiana adopted a constitution and elected Representatives, as Minnesota has done.

On the 2d December, 1816, Mr. Hendricks, Representative from the new State, presented his credentials in the House of Representatives, was sworn in, was appointed on a committee, and was allowed to vote and act as a member of that body; and yet it was not until ten days afterward (on the 12th of the same month) that a joint resolution was passed by both branches of Congress formally admitting Indiana. This kind of resolution was then considered form—nothing but mere form—something which Congress has the power to observe or omit at pleasure, but something with which the State has no concern, and which cannot affect its right. This was then the opinion of John C. Calhoun, at that time a member of the other House; and this, we may fairly presume, would be his opinion if he were a member of the Senate now. When the precedent was established Daniel Webster was also a member of the House, and gave it the weight of his authority. But Minnesota stands upon far stronger grounds than Ohio or Indiana—the ground of Congressional authority. If this authority is good Minnesota cannot fail. This is a great question—a question of constitutional right, of national faith. Congressional faith, I sincerely hope, will be held sacred and inviolate in the case of Minnesota by the prompt admission of her representatives. My sense of duty to my constituents compels me, through you, to make this appeal to the Senate.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JAMES SHIELDS,
Senator from Minnesota.

Hon. JOHN J. CRITTENDEN.

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Pugh, of Ohio, maintaining that the application of Mr. Shields is a question of privilege, but that Minnesota was not a State, not having complied with the conditions of the enabling act, page 862, part 1, of the Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"I say that an enabling act was justified when it was first proposed, on the ground that it was an act of admission, a conditional act of admission, and when the State to be formed complied with the conditions, she was in the Union without anything else. That is the beginning of all the enabling acts; and that is the only excuse Congress ever had for passing one. That is one reason why, in my judgment, it is not necessary for Kansas, or any other new State, when she presents herself, to have any enabling act. Nothing is requisite but an act of admission.

"But cases have arisen where both Houses of Congress have been obliged to consider whether the proposed State has complied with the conditions in the previous act of admission; and that is the question in relation to Minnesota. I have read the report of the Committee on Territories with very great care, and examined the documents submitted with that report; and, although I acknowledge there is no error which we may not heal by a joint resolution of admission, I do not think Minnesota has complied with the terms of the enabling act. I do not think she ever held a convention of delegates as required by that law. I do not consider the breach healed by the subsequent vote that was taken in October. If we object to the form of the vote that was taken in Kansas on the 21st of December, the form of the vote that was taken in Minnesota is just as objectionable; but I agree that these are not fatal defects. They are defects which we can heal by a joint resolution, or a subsequent act of Congress. Therefore, whilst I do believe that this is a question of privilege, that when this gentleman presents himself here, and claims to be a Senator from a State which we have so far recognized as to authorize her to become one on the performance of certain conditions, his claim is a question of privilege. I do not agree that Minnesota has so far complied with the terms of admission as to entitle her Senators and Representatives to be sworn without some waiver by Congress in the shape of a joint resolution. Therefore, whilst I shall vote to consider it a question of privilege, I cannot, on the facts stated by the Committee on Territories, vote that Minnesota is entitled to have her Representatives and Senators here."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, in support of the right of Mr. Shields to a seat, pages 863, 864, part 1, of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"The point that is made on the part of the individual applying to take his seat as a Senator is, that Minnesota is a State in virtue of the enabling act; that that act enabled her on certain terms and conditions to be at once a State, and to come into the Union as such under the Federal Constitution. She has performed those conditions. She has become a State, according to his view and his argument, and is entitled to be represented on this floor as a State. As Mr. Hendricks was permitted in the other House to take his seat, and to vote, and the votes of electors for President and Vice-President were allowed to be counted, although they were elected before any formal admission by Congress, I see no reason why the gentleman in question has not a just, constitutional, and lawful privilege to take his seat here; and, if it be denied to him, to appeal to you and to this body as upon a question of privilege to maintain and vindicate his right.

"The allowing him to take his seat here is one thing and a formal admission of the State another. There may be, and are, certain purposes for which it is very convenient to pass an act of formal admission into the Union. That may be done; but it does not follow because that may be done that the Senator shall not be permitted, before this formal act be done, to take his seat and represent his State. You know that the constitution has been made; you know, and the Senate know, that that constitution is of the character required by the enabling law, and by the Constitution of the United States we know the capacity of the principal to appoint such representatives; we know, however, that in transactions, of such consequence as the admission of States it may be well enough for us to adhere to the principle of giving a subsequent consent, and admitting the State by subsequent act. We can retain that; but where is the reason why this State shall be unrepresented in either House, until you can have passed that act? The forms require delay. Here is a State entitled to admission, and if it is entitled to admission it is entitled to representatives on this floor. It is the privilege of the State to require it; it is the privilege of the person she elects to represent her to require it, and that is all that is done.

"The first question required by the enabling act, in respect to Minnesota in forming her constitution, to be decided, is whether the people of the Territory described desire to be formed and admitted as a State into the Union at once. That question was put, and that question was decided in the affirmative. The people of Minnesota said, 'We desire to be admitted at once; it is not now our wish hereafter to be admitted, but it is our desire, our determination, to be admitted now, at once, into the Union.' That is the question which Congress directed to be put. That is the question which was decided, and every other condition required by Congress was fully complied with, as the constitution now before you shows.

"What evasion then is it, Mr. President, to decline to receive her representatives on this floor on an equal footing with those of the other States of this Union. I confess it seems to me they have as perfect a right as I have to a seat here, and if I might come from my State, with all the legally required authentications of my right, and present them to you, and from negligence, from apathy, from opposition, or from any other cause, you were to refuse to administer to me the oath, the argument of the gentleman from Virginia would apply—'Oh, this is no breach of privilege; you are not a Senator; your State has certified you to be a Senator; the legislature has declared you to be a Senator; but the Federal authorities require you to take an oath, and that oath is necessary to make you a Senator.' No, sir; I am as much a Senator before I take the oath as I am afterwards. It contributes nothing to make me a Senator. If I fail to take that oath and presume to act without it, I am guilty of an offense; but I am a Senator before. Can you treat any gentleman elected to this body in this manner—refuse to administer to him the oath, and then tell him, 'For that cause I have annulled you as a Senator, and you can make no question of privilege in regard to it; one must be a Senator before a question of privilege can attach to him; you are not one, because I have not sworn you; and I will not swear you, because I do not intend that you shall act as a Senator?' If that is not a breach of privilege it is utterly incomprehensible to me what can be. It is a breach of privilege—a flagrant one; and it is not less a breach of privilege because there is the power in those who commit it to avoid responsibility for it."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, citing the case of Ohio, page 866, part 1, of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"In 1802, when Ohio, under an enabling act, had made a constitution and went on under the regular forms to constitute a State government, a committee of this body was appointed. You will not find it in the printed Journals, but it is now in manuscript in the Secretary's office. The committee were to inquire whether or not Ohio was a State. They said Congress had passed an enabling act, that Ohio had complied with the conditions, and that nothing else was necessary but to extend the laws of the United States over her. They did that, and swore in the members. They decided that she had complied with all the conditions, and was a State."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Brown, of Mississippi, maintaining that Minnesota could not become a State until the passage of an act of admission, page 866, part 1, of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"Now, is Minnesota a State of the Union? I shall vote for the resolution proposed by the Senator from Georgia, but I do it in deference to the judgment of other gentlemen, and to get clear of the question now, and not because there is one single shade of a shadow of doubt on my mind on the subject. Minnesota is not a State of the Union. If she is, she must have been made so by the enabling act. There is no pretense that she has become a State in any other way. Who knows? How has it been Congressionally ascertained that she has complied with the enabling act? Where is the judgment on that subject? How has it been ascertained that her constitution does not infringe or violate the Constitution of the United States? When was it ascertained and put upon the record that her constitution is republican in its form? All these things may be true, but they have not been ascertained. There is nothing on the record to show that they are true. Where is the evidence that in fixing her boundaries she has not run into the adjoining States and cut off a part of Iowa and Wisconsin? Has it been ascertained that that is not true? Suppose, without inquiry, just by virtue of the enabling act, she is now in the Union, and it turns out that her constitution is not republican in form, that her boundaries violate the boundaries of the adjoining States, that she has in other respects violated the Constitution of the United States: then what? Is she out of the Union? Do you break up the Union by turning her out to-morrow as soon as you ascertain that these things are true? If she is in the Union, she is in from the day her constitution was passed by the members of the convention which made it, for you have done nothing to give sanction to it since that. If she is in by virtue of the enabling act she is in from the very hour when the convention made the constitution; and then I suppose the very instant you find out that her constitution is in violation of the Constitution of the United States she goes out. That is an act of dissolution.

"I speak of these matters simply to show what strikes me to be the absurdity of declaring a State in the Union in this sort of informal way. If she cannot be in the Union with a constitution anti-republican; if she cannot be in with boundaries which infringe the boundaries of other States; if she cannot be in because her constitution provides for orders of nobility, stars, and garters, and all that; if she cannot be in for any one of the hundred reasons which I could name, then there must be a necessity for ascertaining that these objections do not exist before she is in at all. Who has ascertained it? It is the duty of Congress under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes it to admit new States to ascertain all these points. When they have done it and put that ascertainment in the form of a judgment on the records, the State is in, and not till then. About this I have no doubt, and I am astonished to find that anybody else has; but still in deference to the opinion of other gentlemen, and to get clear of the question, I will vote for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia."

THURSDAY, February 25, 1858.

Mr. Crittenden presented, as a privileged subject, a letter from the Hon. James Shields, setting forth the grounds upon which he claims a right to a seat as a Senator from the State of Minnesota; which was read.

Mr. Crittenden also presented a paper purporting to be the credentials of the Hon. James Shields as a Senator from the State of Minnesota; which was read; and moved that the oath of office be administered to Mr. Shields, and that he be admitted to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, raised the question of order, whether the subject presented by Mr. Crittenden was a privileged subject.

The Vice-President submitted the question for the decision of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, that the subject lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 22, nays 26.

On motion by Mr. Iverson, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson.

Whereupon

Mr. Toombs submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the question of the admission of James Shields to a seat in this body, as a Senator from the State of Minnesota, be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and the resolution was agreed to.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1858.

Mr. Bayard, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws, submitted a report (No. 104), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Minnesota is not a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws."

On motion by Mr. Bayard,

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Bayard (chairman), Toombs, Pugh, Benjamin, Green, Collamer, and Trumbull.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 4, 1858.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Bayard submitted the following report:

The Senate referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, on the 25th ultimo, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the question of the admission of James Shields to a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Minnesota be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws."

Having considered the question as to which they were by the foregoing resolution instructed to inquire, the committee have unanimously adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Minnesota is not a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws.

COMPENSATION OF SENATORS.

TUESDAY, May 25, 1858.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Senate asking the direction of the Vice-President as to the time at which the compensation of the Senators from Minnesota is to commence.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THURSDAY, June 3, 1858.

Mr. Bayard, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Senate in relation to the compensation of the Senators from Minnesota, reported:

That there is no express provision in the act regulating the compensation of members of Congress applicable to the particular case presented; but, in the opinion of the committee, a correct construction of the act of August 16, 1856, forbids the allowance of compensation until the State of Minnesota was admitted into the Union, and that the compensation to the Senators from that State should commence on the day of admission, May 11, 1858.

[There was no debate on the subject of compensation, nor any action on the report.]

[Thirty-seventh Congress—First session.]

WAITMAN T. WILLEY AND JOHN S. CARLILE, of Virginia.

July 13, 1861, the credentials of Mr. Willey, elected to fill the unexpired term ending March 3, 1863, of James M. Mason, expelled, and the credentials of Mr. Carlile, elected to fill the unexpired term ending March 3, 1865, of Robert M. T. Hunter, expelled, were presented. A motion was made that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The credentials stated that the election had been held July 9, 1861, and that it had been "to fill the vacancy which has happened by the withdrawal and abdication" of the two preceding Senators. The motion to refer the credentials was not agreed to, and, after debate, the oaths were administered. Some Senators maintained that by admitting Messrs. Willey and Carlile to their seats the Senate would be undertaking to recognize a government of the State which was not the regular State government, even though that State government were in a state of rebellion; and that the Senate was bound to recognize the fact that the term of office of the governor who was in rebellion had not expired, and that the credentials were not signed by him, but by another as governor. Others favored reference to a committee on the ground that at the time of the election, July 9, 1861, there was no vacancy in the Senate from Virginia, inasmuch as Messrs. Mason and Hunter had not been expelled until July 12, and that the Senate had recognized them as Senators until that day by its action in expelling them at that time. Extracts from speeches given below will show more at length the grounds upon which Senators proceeded.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 1st sess. 37th Cong., with extracts from remarks by Messrs. Bayard, Saulsbury, and Trumbull.

The debates are found on pages 103–109 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 37th Cong.

SATURDAY, July 13, 1861.

Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, presented the credentials of the Hon. John S. Carlile, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Virginia "to fill the vacancy which has happened by the withdrawal and abdication of Robert M. T. Hunter;" which were read.

Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, presented the credentials of the Hon. Waitman T. Willey, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Virginia "to fill the vacancy which has happened by the withdrawal and abdication of James M. Mason;" which were read.

On motion by Mr. Bayard that the credentials of the Hon. Mr. Carlile and the Hon. Mr. Willey be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 35.

On motion by Mr. Powell, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Polk, Powell, and Saulsbury.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Browning, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Latham, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Rice, Sherman, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilmot, and Wilson.

So the motion of Mr. Bayard was not agreed to.

The Vice-President then administered to Mr Carlile and Mr. Willey the oath prescribed by law, and they took their seats in the Senate.

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, in support of the motion made by him that the credentials be referred to a committee; taken from page 103 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"Before the Senate proceeds to swear in these gentlemen, I beg leave to enter my protest. I think these credentials ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. They involve very grave questions. You are undertaking to recognize a government of the State of Virginia which is not the regular State government, even though that State government may be in what you may call a state of rebellion. You are bound to take notice of the fact that Mr. Letcher is governor of Virginia, and that his term of office, under the constitution and laws of Virginia, has not yet expired. If you say he is in rebellion, that does not authorize a portion of the people of Virginia to form a legislature for the purpose of electing Senators to take seats in this body. You have no authority to create a new State out of a part of an existing State. I think the questions are very grave.

"Of course, I know very well that you have the commanding majority in this House; but I think you had better pause and have an investigation before you undertake to swear in members under such an authority. I make the motion, before swearing in either of these gentlemen, that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have no personal feeling of any kind about this matter, but it seems to me to be a grave violation of the Constitution of the United States, and I must enter my protest against it. I make the motion that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, in support of the motion offered by Mr. Bayard that the credentials be referred to a committee; taken from page 103 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"It is a matter of indifference to me, sir, what disposition is made of the credentials of the proposed Senators from Virginia; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one fact, which, in my mind, shows the propriety of the motion now made. These credentials, as read by the Secretary, state that on the 9th day of July the legislature of the State of Virginia, owing to the abdication of Mr. Mason and Mr. Hunter, elected these gentlemen to seats upon this floor. No longer ago, however, sir, than yesterday, this body treated Mr. Mason and Mr. Hunter as members of the Senate of the United States. Yesterday you expelled those gentlemen from seats upon the floor of this Senate as members of the Senate. Then, at the time of this election by the new government of Virginia, there was no vacancy in the Senate of the United States from that State, according to the judgment of the American Senate. Yesterday morning, when you met, according to the judgment of a majority of the members here Mr. Mason and Mr. Hunter were members of this body. You treated them as members of this body; you exercised your power of expulsion upon them. Could you have expelled them, as members of the Senate, from seats on this floor, if they were not at the time of the vote, in your judgment, actually members of this body? If they were yesterday morning members of the Senate of the United States—and you have treated them as such, and expelled them—can you now allow these gentlemen to be sworn in as Senators from the State of Virginia when the credentials presented here show on their face that they were elected not to fill any vacancy; when the facts, as you have decided them, show that there was no vacancy in the Senate? For that reason, and for none other, I think the credentials should go to the Committee on the Judiciary."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, in opposition to the motion made by Mr. Bayard that the credentials be referred to a committee; taken from page 104 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"Mr. President, I think that we should not "stick in the bark" as to dates here. I presume the Senator from Delaware was elected before the vacancy which he filled existed. There is scarcely a Senator here that was not elected in advance, before the office became vacant. I recollect well that the Senators from Minnesota were admitted to seats upon this floor who were elected long before the State of Minnesota was a member of the Union. Nearly every new State which has come into the Union has elected her Senators before the State was admitted.

Now, let me put a case. A few years ago this country was engaged in a war with Mexico. Suppose that one of the Senators from Delaware, instead of being loyal and true to his country, had turned traitor and joined the Mexican army and fought against the United States, and the legislature of Delaware had been in session, knowing the fact that one of their Senators in this body was fighting against this country in the armies of its enemies: must the legislature of Delaware wait till the Congress of the United States assembles, and the Senate, by a formal resolution, expels that Senator? Would not the legislature of Delaware proceed at once to elect a Senator, and when Congress did convene, and a resolution was offered to expel the traitor to his country, would it be said, because the State of Delaware acted before Congress had convened and expelled the traitor, that therefore the other election should go for nothing, and that her legislature must be convened and a new election held?

"Sir, the guilt and the turpitude of the men who once sat as Senators here is far greater than it would have been in the case I have supposed. They have joined in a fratricidal war against their country. They have not joined a foreign enemy, but they have uncertaken to stir up a domestic war. I do not think there is any necessity for their waiting till the formal resolution of expulsion was passed here. Why, sir, these credentials recite the fact that the former Senators have withdrawn and abdicated; and when the expulsion takes place, it may well have reference to the time of their withdrawal and abdication.

"Now, sir, we have the credentials here fair on their face. They purport to be the credentials of Senators elected by the old Commonwealth of Virginia, sent by a person purporting to be the governor of Virginia, and under the great seal of the State. This appears to be fair. But Senators say, "Oh, well; but we know this is not the legislature of Virginia; there is another legislature, and there is another man who is governor." Well, if you are going outside of these credentials to rely on the knowledge which you have of the condition of things in the State of Virginia, then you know that the old governor of Virginia and the old legislature are in rebellion against the country. They are rebels and traitors in arms against the Government, and are not to be recognized as the government of Virginia, but are to be recognized as enemies and traitors, whom the whole power of this Government is now put forth to subdue and bring into obedience to the Constitution and the laws; and I would to God that the power was used to bring them to obedience.

"Now, sir, as I said, I am not for "sticking in the bark" about this matter. Let us take the condition of things as it is. Here is the State of Virginia in rebellion. If you are going outside to inquire after the fact, you will ascertain that a portion of the people of that State have risen in arms against the Government; another portion of the people of that State are loyal to the Union; and the loyal men of Virginia have elected a legislature and seek representation in the Congress of the United States. They are entitled to representation here, and the enemies of the country are not.

"I think there is no necessity for referring this matter to the committee, unless there are some facts to be inquired into. On its face this purports to be an election of Senators from the Commonwealth of Virginia. There is no objection to the form of it, and I do not know that any fact has been suggested by the Senator from Delaware that is to be inquired into. What fact does he propose to inquire into? If he goes to his general knowledge, is he not satisfied that what was the old legislature of Virginia and its former governor are now in rebellion against the Government? And will he recognize them as having any authority to send Senators here? I presume not. And if Virginia is in the Union, her loyal men and not her traitors have a right to be represented here. I trust, sir, that the Senators will be sworn in."

[Thirty-seventh Congress—First and second sessions.]

FREDERIC P. STANTON vs. JAMES H. LANE, of Kansas.

The credentials of Mr. Lane, one of two first Senators elected by the legislature of Kansas in April, 1861, were presented July 4, 1861, and he took his seat. July 12, 1861, a paper purporting to be the credentials of Mr. Stanton, appointed a Senator by the governor to the seat held by Mr. Lane, was presented, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. August 2, 1861, the committee reported that Mr. Lane "was, by the Executive, appointed a brigadier-general in the volunteer forces of the United States on the 20th of June, 1861; that he accepted said appointment, and was legally qualified to perform its duties." In the opinion of the committee the office of brigadier-general under the United States is incompatible with that of member of either House of Congress. By accepting the office of brigadier-general, the sitting member, Mr. Lane, virtually resigned his seat in the Senate, and it became vacant at that time. On the 8th day of July, 1861, the governor of Kansas gave to the contestant, Mr. Stanton, a commission in due form appointing him a Senator of the United States from the State of Kansas to fill the aforesaid vacancy, and by virtue of that commission Mr. Stanton now claims his seat. Your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions: "1. Resolved, That James H. Lane is not entitled to a seat in this body. 2. Resolved, That Frederic P. Stanton is entitled to a seat in this body." No action was taken on the report or resolutions during this session of Congress. December 18, 1861, in the next session of Congress, the report was recommitted to the committee. The committee reported the same without amendment January 6, 1862. January 16, 1862, the first resolution was amended by striking out the word "not," and it was "Resolved, That James H. Lane is entitled to a seat in this body;" and the second resolution was indefinitely postponed. Of those voting in favor of Mr. Lane's title to the seat some proceeded upon the ground that on the 20th of June, 1861, the office of brigadier-general did not exist, and consequently that Mr. Lane was not a "person holding any office;" others upon the ground that although he held an office after he had been elected Senator, yet, having resigned the same before taking his seat in the Senate, he did not come within the provision of section 6 of the first article of the Constitution.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 1st and 2d sess. 37th Cong., with the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 37th Cong., No. 1.

The documents relating to the case are Ex. Doc. No. 8 and Mis. Doc. No. 11, from Senate Executive and Miscellaneous Documents, 1st sess. 37th Cong.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

THURSDAY, July 4, 1861.

Mr. Grimes presented the credentials of the Hon. James Henry Lane, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Kansas.

The credentials were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Lane.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1861.

Mr. Foot presented a paper purporting to be the credentials of the Hon. Frederic P. Stanton, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. Foot presented a memorial of Frederic P. Stanton, asking admission as a member of the Senate of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[A brief statement by Mr. Lane is found on page 82 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 37th Cong.]

TUESDAY, July 16, 1861.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, presented a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department inclosing a copy of the appointment of F. P. Stanton as special agent to Kansas and New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WEDNESDAY, July 31, 1861.

Mr. Lane, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the Hon. James H. Lane, a member of this body from Kansas, has been appointed a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States; and, if so, whether he has accepted such appointment."

FRIDAY, August 2, 1861.

Mr. Foster, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials and the memorial of Frederic P. Stanton, claiming to be entitled to a seat in the United States Senate, under an appointment of the governor of Kansas, in the place of the Hon. James H. Lane, submitted a report (No. 1), accompanied by the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That James H. Lane is not entitled to a seat in this body.

"Resolved, That Frederic P. Stanton is entitled to a seat in this body."

On motion by Mr. Foster,

Ordered, That the report be printed.

[Remarks in regard to recommitting the report for the purpose of having printed with it the President's reply to the resolution of July 31, given above, are found on pages 406, 407 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 37th Cong.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Foster, Ten Eyck, Cowan, Harris, Bayard, and Powell.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

AUGUST 2, 1861.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Foster made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials and the memorial of Frederic P. Stanton, of the State of Kansas, asking admission to a seat in this body in place of the Hon. James H. Lane, now holding said seat, having had the same under consideration, report:

That the contestant and sitting member have appeared before them and submitted, severally, their statements and made their exhibits.

The committee find the following facts: That the sitting member, the Hon. James H. Lane, was, by the Executive, appointed a brigadier-general in the volunteer forces of the United States on the 20th of June, 1861; that he accepted said appointment, and was legally qualified to perform its duties.

In the opinion of the committee the office of brigadier-general under the United States is incompatible with that of member of either House of Congress. By accepting the office of brigadier-general, the sitting member, Mr. Lane, virtually resigned his seat in the Senate, and it became vacant at that time.

On the 8th day of July, 1861, the governor of Kansas gave to the contestant, Mr Stanton, a commission in due form appointing him a Senator of the United States from the State of Kansas to fill the aforesaid vacancy, and by virtue of that commission Mr. Stanton now claims his seat.

Your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That James H. Lane is not entitled to a seat in this body.
2. Resolved, That Frederic P. Stanton is entitled to a seat in this body.

The evidence from which your committee find the facts herein set forth is, substantially, the following:

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 15, 1861.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry in regard to the appointment of the Hon. James H. Lane as brigadier-general, I herewith transmit you documents upon the case:

A. Copy of letter to Secretary of War from Adjutant-General Thomas.
B. Form of appointment (printed blank).
C. Telegram of assistant adjutant-general to commanding officer at Fort Leavenworth.
D. Letter of acceptance of regiments.

The Secretary of War directs me to state that he himself, after having signed the commission of Hon. James H. Lane as brigadier-general, handed it personally to him in presence of the Adjutant-General at the War Department.

Respectfully,

JAMES LESLEY, JR.,
Chief Clerk, War Department.

Hon. F. P. STANTON.

A.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 15, 1861.

SIR: In reply to the inquiry of the Hon. F. P. Stanton of the 13th instant, referred by you to this office, I respectfully state that on the 20th ultimo you directed an appointment as brigadier-general of the three years' volunteers to be made for the Hon.

James H. Lane, of Kansas. The appointment was made as directed, and handed to you for signature, but was not returned to this office for record.

I inclose herewith a blank letter of appointment, similar to the one used in his case.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. THOMAS,
Adjutant-General.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

B.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 20, 1861.

SIR: You are hereby informed that the President of the United States has appointed you brigadier-general of the volunteer force raised in conformity with the President's proclamation of May 3, 1861, in the service of the United States, to rank as such from 17th day of May, 1861. Should the Senate, at their next session, advise and consent thereto, you will be commissioned accordingly.

Immediately on receipt hereof, please to communicate to this Department, through the Adjutant-General's Office, your acceptance or non-acceptance of said appointment; and, with your letter of acceptance, return to the Adjutant-General of the Army the oath, herewith inclosed, properly filled up, subscribed, and attested, reporting at the same time your age, residence, when appointed, and the State in which you were born.

Should you accept you will at once report by letter for orders to Secretary of War.

Brig. Gen. JAMES H. LANE,
United States Volunteers.

The original of which this purports to be a copy was not produced before the committee. General Lane stated that it was in the hands of Colonel Weer, at Leavenworth. General Lane also stated that there was a variation, in some respects, between this copy and the original, but no variation was specified which the committee deemed material.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 20, 1861.

DEAR SIR: This Department will accept two regiments, for three years or during the war, in addition to the three regiments the Department has already accepted from the governor of Kansas, to be raised and organized by you in Kansas. Orders will be given to muster the same into service immediately on being ready to be so mustered; and on being mustered the requisite arms, &c., will be furnished on the requisition of the mustering officer, who is hereby authorized to make the same.

By order of the President.

SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

General JAMES H. LANE.

Official copy.

J. LESLEY, JR.,
Chief Clerk.

I, John D. Clark, justice of the peace in and for Washington County, District of Columbia, do hereby certify that on or about the 20th day of June last General James H. Lane swore to and subscribed the form of the within oath before me, which I duly certified and delivered to him.

Given under my hand this 15th July, 1861.

JOHN D. CLARK, J. P.

By request of Mr. Stanton.

I, James H. Lane, appointed a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States, do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will bear true allegiance to the United States of America; and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies or opposers whatsoever, and observe and obey the orders of the President of the United States and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, at ———, this ——— day of ———, 186–.

———— ————,
Justice of the Peace.

The following article appeared in the Daily Times, of Leavenworth, on the 26th of June last:

LEAVENWORTH, June 25, 1861.

Mr. EDITOR: On the 20th instant I was duly appointed a brigadier-general in the volunteer force of the United States, and thereupon received the following order:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 20, 1861.

DEAR SIR: This Department will accept two regiments for three years or during the war, in addition to the three regiments the Department has already accepted from the governor of Kansas, to be raised and organized by you in Kansas. Orders will be given to muster the same into service immediately on being ready to be so mustered; and on being mustered the requisite arms, &c., will be furnished on the requisition of the mustering officer, who is hereby authorized to make the same.

By order of the President.

SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

General JAMES H. LANE.

Fellow-citizens of Kansas and adjoining States and Territories:

The important trust thus confided to me has occurred at a momentous period in our history as a nation. An insurrectionary war, commenced by rebels, in defiance of patriotism and duty, has now approached our border. Treason has raised its bloody hand almost in our very midst to strike down our glorious flag made blessed by the memories of our fathers. The horrors of war are no longer far removed from us, but have been brought by traitorous hands to our very hearthstones. Impressed with the necessity of prompt and vigorous action in defense of our country, its flag, and our homes, the President has authorized the formation of a brigade of five regiments in Kansas. He has been pleased to place in my hands the honor of leading the gallant sons of the youngest State of the Union to victory in defence of that Union of which it has so lately become a part. Treason and rebellion surround us. Loyal American citizens driven from their homes are crying to us for protection. The best Government in the world is assailed by wicked hands. Men of Kansas and the surrounding country, in the name of all we hold sacred, and by the authority of our constitutional ruler, I invoke you to rally to the Stars and Stripes; come forward and join the regiments accepted from our State.

When organized, the watchword of the brigade will be the downfall of treason wherever found and the upholding of Union men in every State and place.

JAMES H. LANE,
Brigadier-General.

General Lane stated to the committee that he wrote the body of the address only, and did not affix his name as brigadier-general.

The requisitions mentioned in the following letter of General Meigs were read before the committee by General Lane; he stated that he made them but did not sign them as brigadier-general, nor was that title annexed to his name. The requisitions not being in possession of the committee are not inserted in this report.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington City, June 26, 1861.

SIR: I am informed that you are able and willing to supply the regulation uniforms for two regiments, including four companies of cavalry, four companies of mounted artillery, and twelve companies of infantry, subject to regulation, inspection as to work and material, and at the United States prices.

This clothing is for two regiments to be raised and commanded by General Lane, of Kansas, and must be delivered in time to reach Fort Leavenworth before the 20th July, at which time the regiment is to take the field.

I inclose General Lane's requisitions, three in number, specifying the articles and indorsed by me for identification. Also a copy of order No. 23, of November 30, 1859, fixing prices.

Be good enough to signify by telegraph your acceptance or rejection of this order, and if rejected return the requisitions by bearer.

When ready for inspection a United States inspector will be sent to Boston to look at them.

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General.

Messrs. HAUGHTON, SAWYER & Co.,
Boston, Mass.

The above is a true copy.

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General.

MONDAY, August 5, 1861.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, presented papers relative to his appointment as a brigadier-general of volunteers, and his acceptance of the said appointment.

Ordered, That they lie on the table and be printed.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Foster rose to a question of privilege, and moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of Frederic P. Stanton, claiming to be a Senator of the State of Kansas, under an appointment of the governor of the State, in the place of the Hon. James H. Lane; and

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. Foster, it was determined in the negative—yeas 17, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Foster, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Breckinridge, Carlile, Cowan, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pearce, Powell, Simmons, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Baker, Bingham, Bright, Browning, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Fessenden, Hale, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Latham, Polk, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Wilkinson, Wilmot, and Wilson.

So the motion of Mr. Foster was not agreed to.

[The debate is found on pages 438–441 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 37th Cong.]

TUESDAY, August 6, 1861.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. Nicolay, his secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of your honorable body of date July 31, 1861, requesting the President to inform the Senate whether the Hon. James H. Lane, a member of that body from Kansas, has been appointed a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States, and if so, whether he has accepted such appointment, I have the honor to transmit herewith certain papers, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, which, taken together, explain themselves; and which contain all the information I possess upon the questions propounded.

It was my intention, as shown by my letter of June 20, 1861, to appoint Hon. James H. Lane, of Kansas, a brigadier-general of United States volunteers, in anticipation of the act of Congress, since passed, for raising such volunteers; and I have no further knowledge upon the subject except as derived from the papers herewith inclosed.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 5, 1861.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, at its next session, copies of any order under which General James H. Lane is authorized to raise troops for the war; also of all requisitions made by the said Lane, and of all orders given by the War Department at his instance for horses, arms, clothing, subsistence, and for mustering into service the troops composing the brigade known as General Lane's brigade in Kansas."

[Brief remarks in regard to the printing of the President's message are found on pages 450–452 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 37th Cong.]

[Second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress.]

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1861.

On motion by Mr. Foster, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, on the 2d of August last, on the application of the Hon. Frederic P. Stanton for admission to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Kansas, under an appointment from the governor, in the place of the Hon. James H. Lane; and

On motion by Mr. Foster,

Ordered, That the resolutions lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1861.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Frederic P. Stanton to be entitled to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon. James H. Lane; and

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1861.

On motion by Mr. Foster, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary affirming the right of Frederic P. Stanton to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon. James H. Lane; and

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Collamer that the resolutions and the report of the committee be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 9.

On motion by Mr. Foster, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bright, Browning, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, King, Lane of Indiana, Latham, Morrill, Pearce, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Wade, Willey, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Johnson of Tennessee, Nesmith, Simmons, Ten Eyck, and Trumbull.

So it was Ordered, That the resolutions and the report of the committee be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[The debate on the motion to recommit is found on pages 127–130 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

MONDAY, January 6, 1862.

Mr. Foster, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of the Hon. Frederic P. Stanton, claiming to be entitled to the seat in the Senate now occupied by the Hon.

James H. Lane, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that the Senate do adopt the following resolutions:

Resolved, That James H. Lane is not entitled to a seat in this body.

Resolved, That Frederic P. Stanton is entitled to a seat in this body.

TUESDAY, January 7, 1862.

On motion by Mr. Foster, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Frederic P. Stanton entitled to the seat in the Senate now held by the Hon. James H. Lane as a Senator from the State of Kansas; and

On motion by Mr. Kennedy, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Frederic P. Stanton entitled to the seat in the Senate now held by the Hon. James H. Lane as a Senator from the State of Kansas; and

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Grimes,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 222–227 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

MONDAY, January 13, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Frederic P. Stanton entitled to the seat now held by the Hon. James H. Lane as a Senator from the State of Kansas.

On motion by Mr. Collamer that Frederic P. Stanton, who contests the seat of the Hon. James H. Lane, have leave to be heard in person at the bar of the Senate, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 4.

On motion by Mr. Fessenden, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Bright, Browning, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Latham, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pearce, Pomeroy, Powell, Simmons, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Dixon, Hale, Sumner, and Wilkinson.

So it was Ordered, That Frederic P. Stanton, who contests the seat of the Hon. James H. Lane, have leave to be heard in person at the bar of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. Fessenden that the Senate reconsider the vote agreeing to the motion of Mr. Collamer, it was determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. Clark to amend the first resolution reported by the committee by striking out the word "not,"

After debate, and the consideration of executive business,

On motion by Mr. Pearce, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 290–297 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Frederic P. Stanton entitled to the seat now held by the Hon. James H. Lane as a Senator from the State of Kansas; and

The amendment proposed by Mr. Clark to the first resolution, viz, strike out the word "not," being under consideration,

After debate, and the consideration of executive business,

On motion by Mr. Hale, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 336–344 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

THURSDAY, January 16, 1862.

The Vice-President announced that the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it was the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of the Senate of yesterday, which was the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Frederic P. Stanton entitled to the seat in the Senate now held by the Hon. James H. Lane as a Senator from the State of Kansas; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the said resolutions.

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Clark to the first resolution, viz, strike out the word "not,"

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 16.

On motion by Mr. Clark, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bright, Browning, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, King, Lane of Indiana, Latham, Morrill, Pomeroy, Rice, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wilkinson, Wilmot, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Carlile, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Johnson, Kennedy, McDougall, Nesmith, Pearce, Powell, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, and Wade.

So the amendment was agreed to.

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was

Resolved, That James H. Lane is entitled to a seat in this body.

On the question to agree to the second resolution reported by the committee,

On motion by Mr. Hale,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed indefinitely.

COMPENSATION OF MR. STANTON.

[First session of the Thirty-seventh Congress.]

TUESDAY, August 6, 1861.

Mr. Dixon submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the usual mileage and pay be allowed and paid to Frederic P. Stanton while contesting his right to a seat in the Senate from the State of Kansas."

[Second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress.]

THURSDAY, January 16, 1862.

Mr. Dixon submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

"Resolved, That the usual compensation and mileage of a Senator be allowed to Frederic P. Stanton up to the time of the termination of his contest for a seat in the Senate as a Senator for the present Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund."

[The debate is found on pages 359–364 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

FRIDAY, January 17, 1862.

Mr. Dixon, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution allowing the usual pay and mileage of a Senator to Frederic P. Stanton during the time he was contesting the seat of the Hon. James H. Lane, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution, as in Committee of the Whole, and having been amended on the motion of Mr. Fessenden, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time, as follows:

"Resolved, That the usual compensation, exclusive of mileage which he has already received, of a Senator be allowed to Frederic P. Stanton up to the termination of his contest for a seat in the Senate as a Senator for the present Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund;"

And on the question, Shall the resolution pass? it was determined in the affirmative.

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Fessenden that the Senate reconsider the vote on the passage of the resolution allowing pay and mileage to Frederic P. Stanton, it was determined in the affirmative.

The question recurring upon the passage of the resolution, and the same having been amended on the motion of Mr. Fessenden, by striking out the words "which he has already received," it was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the usual compensation, exclusive of mileage, of a Senator be allowed to Frederic P. Stanton up to the time of the termination of his contest for a seat in the Senate as a Senator for the present Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund."

[Thirty-seventh Congress—Second session.]

BENJAMIN STARK,

Senator from Oregon from February 27, 1862, till September 13, 1862.

January 6, 1862, the credentials of Mr. Stark, who had been appointed by the governor of Oregon to fill a vacancy, were presented in the Senate. A resolution was submitted that the oath be not administered to Mr. Stark, and that his credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. January 10, after a debate on the prima facie right of Mr. Stark to the seat, the resolution was agreed to. February 7, the committee, "without expressing any opinion as to the effect of the papers before them upon any subsequent proceedings in the case," reported a resolution that Mr. Stark was entitled to take the oath of office. Mr. Trumbull, dissenting, "conceived that it was the duty of the committee to have expressed its opinion on the evidence of disloyalty before it, and to have reported in favor of or against the swearing in of the Senator, as the evidence should warrant, and not allow him to be first sworn and leave the question of his loyalty to be subsequently determined on a motion to expel." The report was accompanied by testimony. February 27 the resolution reported by the committee passed after amendment, and Mr. Stark took his seat. February 28 a resolution was submitted that the papers relating to the loyalty of Benjamin Stark be referred to the same committee with instructions to investigate the charges preferred against him. March 18 this resolution passed the Senate, having been so amended that the papers were referred to a select committee instead of to the Committee on the Judiciary. April 22 this committee reported the conclusions from the facts proved, one of which was "that the Senator from Oregon is disloyal to the Government of the United States." One member of the committee did not concur in this conclusion. May 7 a resolution was submitted that Mr. Stark, who had been found disloyal by a committee of the Senate, be expelled, which resolution was determined in the negative, June 6, by a vote of 16 yeas to 21 nays.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 2d sess. 37th Cong.; the report (majority and minority) of the Committee on the Judiciary (excepting the evidence), from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 37th Cong., No. 11; and the report of the select committee from Senate Reports, Ib. No. 38.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

MONDAY, January 6, 1862.

Mr. Nesmith presented the credentials of the Hon. Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator in Congress by the governor of the State of Oregon to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. Edward D. Baker; which were read.

Mr. Fessenden moved that the oath prescribed by law be not administered to Mr. Stark, and that his credentials, together with certain papers presented by Mr. Fessenden, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Bayard,

Ordered, That the motion of Mr. Fessenden lie on the table.

[The debate is found on pages 183–185 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

THURSDAY, January 9, 1862.

On motion by Mr. Bayard that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. Fessenden the 6th instant, that the oath prescribed by law be not administered to Mr. Stark, and that his credentials, together with certain papers presented by Mr. Fessenden, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was determined in the negative.

FRIDAY, January 10, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. Fessenden the 6th instant, "that the oath prescribed by law be not administered to Mr. Stark, and that his credentials, together with certain papers presented by Mr. Fessenden, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary."

On motion by Mr. Bayard to amend the motion of Mr. Fessenden by striking out the word "not,"

After debate, it was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 29.

On motion by Mr. Bayard, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Latham, Nesmith, Pearce, Powell, Rice, Saulsbury, and Thomson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson.

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. Fessenden, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 11.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Carlile, Kennedy, Latham, Nesmith, Pearce, Powell, Rice, Saulsbury, and Thomson.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1862.

Mr. Harris, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. Benjamin Stark, with certain papers presented by Mr. Fessenden in reference thereto, submitted a report (No. 11), accompanied by the following resolution (resolution given below in report).

Mr. Trumbull asked and obtained leave to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject.

On motion by Mr. Sumner,

Ordered, That the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, with the views of the minority of the committee, and the accompanying papers, be printed.

[The debate is found on pages 696, 697 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Foster, Ten Eyck, Cowan Harris, Bayard, and Powell.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 7, 1862.—Read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Harris submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Benjamin Stark as a Senator from the State of Oregon, with the accompanying papers, have had the same under consideration, and, without expressing any opinion as to the effect of the papers before them upon any subsequent proceedings in the case, they report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, of Oregon, appointed a Senator of that State by the governor thereof, is entitled to take the Constitutional oath of office.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY

Of the Committee on the Judiciary (Mr. Trumbull) on the credentials of Benjamin Stark as a Senator from Oregon, and the papers presented on the subject.

FEBRUARY 7, 1862.—Ordered to be printed.

Unable to agree with the majority of the committee, to whom were referred the credentials of Benjamin Stark, with the accompanying papers, the undersigned submits the following views:

A preliminary question was raised in the Senate when this case was referred to the committee, whether it was competent for the Senate for any cause to refuse to allow a person to be sworn as a member of the Senate whose credentials were in proper form, and who possessed all the qualifications as to age, citizenship, and inhabitancy prescribed by the Constitution, and whether the only remedy which the Senate had to protect itself against the presence of an infamous person, a convicted felon, or an avowed and open traitor, was not by expulsion by a two-thirds vote after he should have been sworn into office. The Senate decided, after debate, to refer the credentials of Mr. Stark, with the accompanying papers, consisting of written statements and affidavits impeaching his loyalty, to the committee without allowing him to be sworn. A majority of the committee now report the case back, with a resolution that Mr. Stark is entitled to take the Constitutional oath, expressly stating that they do so "without expressing any opinion as to the effect of the papers before them upon any subsequent proceedings in the case."

This reservation of opinion on the evidence could only have become necessary on the sup-

* The accompanying documents are annexed to the report (pages 5–15), a reference to which is given in the head-note.

position that some subsequent proceedings might be taken in the case, referring doubtless to a motion to expel the Senator after he should have been admitted a member, for the reasons assigned in the accompanying papers, in effect establishing the principle that evidence of disloyalty, which might be sufficient to expel a member when admitted, was not sufficient to prevent his qualifying as a member. To this principle the undersigned cannot agree. He believes it was the duty of the committee to examine and pass upon the evidence before it, and if found insufficient to prevent Mr. Stark from taking the Constitutional oath, that it would also be insufficient to warrant his expulsion after he was admitted.

It is admitted that neither the Senate, Congress, nor a State can superadd other qualifications for a Senator to those prescribed by the Constitution, and yet either may prevent a person possessing all those qualifications, and duly elected, from taking his seat in the Senate. Does any one question the right of a State to arrest for crime a person duly qualified for and appointed a Senator, hold him in confinement, and thereby prevent his appearing in the Senate to qualify? Suppose a Senator, after his appointment, and before qualifying, to commit the crime of murder, would any one question the right of the State authorities where the crime was committed to arrest, confine, and, if found guilty, execute the murderer, and thereby forever prevent his taking his seat? Or, if the punishment for the offense was imprisonment, would any one question the right to hold the Senator in prison, and thereby prevent his appearing in the Senate?

Could the Senate in such a case expel him before he had been admitted to a seat? Or must he [be] brought from the felon's cell, be introduced into the Senate, and sworn as a member before his seat could be declared vacant? If not, must the State go unrepresented till the time for which he was appointed has expired? Or would it be competent for the Senate in such a case, by a majority vote, to declare the convict incompetent to hold a seat in the body, and thereby open the way for the appointment of a successor? It is manifest that the prescribing of the qualifications for a Senator in the Constitution was not intended to prevent his being held amenable for his crimes. The fact that the Constitution declares that Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same." is conclusive that for those offenses they may be arrested. As a punishment for crime, then, it is clear that a Senator-elect, possessing all the Constitutional qualifications of age, citizenship, and inhabitancy, may be prevented from taking the oath of office. Congress has repeatedly acted upon the presumption that it was entirely competent for it to prescribe, as a punishment for crime, an inability forever afterwards to hold any office of honor, profit, or trust under the United States.

By a statute passed in 1790, any person giving a reward to a United States judge as a bribe to procure from him any opinion or judgment, and the judge receiving such bribe, are both declared to be forever disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. By an act passed in 1853, any member of Congress after his election, and whether before or after he is qualified, who shall accept any reward given for the purpose of influencing his vote on any question which may come before him in his official capacity is declared incapable forever of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Similar laws, it is believed, exist in most of the States, prescribing as part of the punishment for particular offenses, such as dueling, bribery, and some others, a disqualification for holding any office under the State, and this notwithstanding the State constitutions may have prescribed the qualifications for members of their legislatures, of which the disqualification arising from the conviction for crime was not one. The power of Congress to prescribe the punishment for treason is expressly given by the Constitution, except that it cannot be made to work corruption of blood or forfeiture beyond the life of the person attainted. Does any one doubt the power of Congress under this clause of the Constitution to declare that a person convicted of treason should forever be incapable of holding any office under the United States? If this were done, would it be pretended that a convicted traitor was entitled to be sworn as a Senator? The clause of the Constitution prescribing the qualifications of Senators and Representatives could never have been intended to limit the power to make disqualification to hold those or any other offices a penalty for the commission of crime, especially treason. Its design, doubtless, was to produce uniformity of qualification in all the States, and to prevent any particular class of persons, such as ministers of the gospel, or others, from being excluded from these positions. If it be competent for Congress to make disqualification to hold office a punishment for an offense against the United States, then it is clearly competent for the Senate, which, by the Constitution, is made "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," to do the same thing, so far as the right to take a seat in that body is concerned. Doubtless a law of Congress declaring that a person convicted of a particular offense should not hold office under the United States, and the decision of the courts sustaining such a law, would not preclude the Senate from admitting such a person to a seat, should it think proper, because the Senate is the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; yet it is hardly conceivable that the Senate ever would admit such a person to be sworn; nor does the fact that Congress has not adopted such a punishment for disloyalty or treason prevent the Senate from refusing to allow to be sworn as a member a person believed by the body to be guilty of those offenses or other infamous crimes.

That one avowed traitor, a convicted felon, or a person known to be disloyal to the Government, has a constitutional right to be admitted into the body, would imply that the Senate had no power of protecting itself—a power which, from the nature of things, must be inherent in every legislative body. Suppose a member sent to the Senate, before being sworn, were to disturb the body and by violence interrupt its proceedings, would the Senate be compelled to allow such a person to be sworn as a member of the body before it could cast him out? Surely not, unless the Senate is unable to protect itself and preserve its own order. The Constitution declares that "each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." The connection of the sentence in which the power of expulsion is given would indicate that it was intended to be exercised for some act done as a member, and not for some cause existing before the member was elected or took his seat. For any crime or infamous act done before that time the appropriate remedy would seem to be to refuse to allow him to qualify, which, in the judgment of the undersigned, the Senate may properly do; not by way of adding to the qualifications imposed by the Constitution, but as a punishment due to his crimes or the infamy of his character. Hence, the undersigned, conceiving that it was the duty of the committee to have expressed its opinion on the evidence of disloyalty before it, and to have reported in favor of or against the swearing in of the Senator, as the evidence should warrant, and not allow him to be first sworn, and leave the question of his loyalty to be subsequently determined on a motion to expel, the undersigned forbears to review the evidence of disloyalty before the committee, or to express any opinion upon it, till the pending question of jurisdiction to consider it is determined.

LYMAN TRUMBULL.

TUESDAY, February 18, 1862.

On motion by Mr. Harris, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Oregon, entitled to take the constitutional oath of office; and

On motion by Mr. Hale that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of Benjamin Stark, of Oregon, appointed a Senator of that State by the governor thereof, be recommitted to the committee, and that said committee be instructed to report on the facts proved or admitted, whether, in their judgment, the evidence before them so far impeaches his loyalty as to disqualify him from holding a seat in the Senate of the United States,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Doolittle, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 861–873 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

THURSDAY, February 20, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Oregon, is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office; and

On motion by Mr. Wilkinson,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

MONDAY, February 24, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Oregon, entitled to take the constitutional oath of office; and,

After debate and the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 925–929 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, February 26, 1862.

On motion by Mr. Harris, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, affirming the right of Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Oregon, to take the constitutional oath of office; and

Mr. Hale having withdrawn the motion made by him to recommit the report to the Committee on the Judiciary, with certain instructions,

On motion by Mr. Sumner to amend the resolution by striking out the words "is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office," and in lieu therof inserting "and now charged with disloyalty by the affidavits of many citizens of Oregon, and also by a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, and signed jointly by many citizens of Oregon, some of whom hold public trusts under the United States, is not entitled to take the constitutional oath of office without a previous investigation into the truth of the charge,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Fessenden that the Senate adjourn, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 20.

[The debate is found on pages 963–975 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

THURSDAY, February 27, 1862.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, affirming the right of Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Oregon, to take the constitutional oath of office; and

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Sumner to the resolution, viz:

Strike out the words "is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office" and in lieu thereof insert "and now charged with disloyalty by the affidavits of many citizens of Oregon, and also by a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, and signed jointly by many citizens of Oregon, some of whom hold public trusts under the United States, is not entitled to take the constitutional oath of office without a previous investigation into the truth of the charge,"

After debate, it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 26.

On motion by Mr. Sumner, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, King, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilmot, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Kennedy, Latham, McDougall, Nesmith, Pearce, Powell, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Simmons, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Willey, and Wilson of Missouri.

On motion by Mr. Doolittle to amend the resolution by inserting at the end thereof the words "without prejudice to any subsequent proceedings in the case," it was determined in the affirmative.

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, as follows:

"Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, of Oregon, appointed a Senator of that State by the governor thereof, is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office without prejudice to any subsequent proceedings in the case,"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 19.

On motion by Mr. Sumner, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Kennedy, Latham, McDougall, Nesmith, Pearce, Powell, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Simmons, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Willey, and Wilson of Missouri.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, King, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilmot, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to; and

The Vice-President administered to Mr. Stark the oath prescribed by law, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[The debate is found on pages 988–994 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

FRIDAY, February 28, 1862.

Mr. Stark submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the papers relating to the loyalty of Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to investigate the charges preferred against said Stark on all evidence which has been or may be presented, and with power to send for persons and papers."

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and

After debate,

On motion by Mr. McDougall that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 32.

On motion by Mr. King, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Carlile, Hale, McDougall, Nesmith, Pearce, Powell, and Saulsbury.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, King, Lane of Indiana, Latham, Morrill, Pomeroy, Rice, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

Pending further debate upon the resolution,

The Vice-President announced that the hour of 1 o'clock had arrived, and that it was the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day for that hour, which was the bill (S. 151) to confiscate the property and free the slaves of rebels, being the unfinished business of the Senate at its last adjournment; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the said bill.

[The debate is found on pages 1011–1014 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

TUESDAY, March 18, 1862.

On motion by Mr. Howe, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Stark the 28th of February, in relation to an investigation into certain charges of disloyalty preferred against him; and

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Wilkinson that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 3, nays 35.

On motion by Mr. Howe, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Hale, Saulsbury, and Wilkinson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Browning, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kennedy, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Latham, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Sherman, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Trumbull, Wade, Wilmot, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

After further debate,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull to amend the resolution by striking out the words "the Committee on the Judiciary" and inserting "a select committee to consist of five members," it was determined in the affirmative.

On the question to agree to the resolution, as amended, as follows:

"Resolved, That the papers relating to the loyalty of Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to a select committee to consist of five members, with instructions to investigate the charges preferred against said Stark on all evidence which has been or may be presented, and with power to send for persons and papers,"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 3.

On motion by Mr. Hale, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kennedy, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Latham, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Rice, Sherman, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilmot, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Hale, and Saulsbury.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. Collamer,

Ordered, That the select committee authorized by the said resolution be appointed by the Vice-President.

The Vice-President appointed Mr. Clark, Mr. Howard, Mr. Wright, Mr. Willey, and Mr. Howe.

[The debate is found on pages 1261–1266 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

TUESDAY, April 2, 1862.

Mr. Clark, from the select committee appointed to investigate the truth of certain charges against the Hon. Benjamin Stark, a Senator from the State of Oregon, submitted a report (No. 38), which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Clark, Howard, Wright, Willey, and Sherman.*]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

APRIL 22, 1862.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Clark submitted the following report:

The select committee to whom were referred "the papers relating to the loyalty of Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon," report:

By the resolution under which the committee were appointed they were instructed "to investigate the charges preferred against said Stark on all the evidence which has been or may be presented, and with power to send for persons and papers."

The first question which presented itself for the consideration of the committee was, whether they would proceed to take further testimony than that already taken and referred to them by the resolution. In determining this question the committee were influenced by the facts that the Senator whose loyalty is questioned comes from the distant State of Oregon; that the witnesses who could be supposed to know most in regard to his loyalty resided in that State, and that their testimony could not be had until the next session of Congress; that the Senator was appointed by the governor of Oregon to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the lamented Baker, and that his term would expire upon the meeting of the legislature of Oregon in September next, and before the testimony could be received and used.

The committee therefore came to the conclusion that it was not practicable to take further testimony, unless the Senator from Oregon, Mr. Stark, might desire to take testimony to rebut that already before the committee.

To ascertain Mr. Stark's desire on this point, they caused to be addressed to him a letter, of which the following is a copy:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Committee Room on Claims, March 20, 1862.

SIR: At a meeting of the select committee authorized by the resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant "to investigate the charges preferred against Mr. Stark, on all evidence which has been or may be presented, with power to send for persons and papers," the following resolution was adopted:

On motion by Mr. Howard,

"Resolved, That the Hon. Mr. Stark be notified of the next meeting of the committee, and be invited to attend and submit to the committee any suggestions or matters he may be pleased to present in relation to the subject with which the committee is charged."

In conformity with the foregoing resolution you are respectfully notified that the next meeting of the committee will be held at the room of the Senate Committee on Claims on Monday next, the 24th instant, at 11 o'clock a. m., which you are invited to attend.

By order of the committee.

N. C. TOWLE,
Clerk Select Committee, &c.

Hon. BENJAMIN STARK,
Senator from Oregon.

The committee met on the 24th of March, and the Senator from Oregon attended the meeting in compliance with the invitation of the committee, and desired that the committee should examine the papers before them, and if they should come to the conclusion that grounds were furnished for the charge of disloyalty by the papers and testimony, that the committee should draw up specific charges, to which he would file his answer. This the committee declined to do, for the reason that they did not wish to become his prosecutors, and were charged by the Senate with investigation and not accusation.

Mr. Stark was informed that the committee did not propose to take any further testimony unless he desired it, but would investigate the charges as presented by the papers then before them. To which the committee understood Mr. Stark to reply that he did not wish to take any further testimony as the matter stood. It was then suggested by the committee to the Senator from Oregon that he should sumbit to the committee his answer in writing to the allegations and evidence then before the committee, with any further evidence he might wish to present, and that the committee would adjourn to afford him the necessary time for that purpose.

With this proposal the Senator expressed his compliance and satisfaction, and the committee adjourned to meet again at his convenience.

* Mr. Sherman was appointed in place of Mr. Howe, excused

At a subsequent meeting of the committee on the 14th April the following statement was presented from Mr. Stark and considered:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of a note from your committee, inviting me to make any suggestions I may think proper upon the statements and ex parte affidavits in relation to my loyalty, which were referred to the committee under the resolution adopted by the Senate on the —— ultimo.

Deeply sensible of the courtesy of the committee thus extended to me, I regret that unavoidable absence from the city and the pressure of other engagements have prevented me from making an earlier response.

I presume that in extending to me this invitation before entering upon the investigation necessary to a discharge of the delicate duty devolved upon them by the Senate the committee designed simply to afford me an opportunity, if I should deem it proper to do so, to present my personal views of the matter now pending before them.

Under the resolution of reference, the committee are clothed with the fullest powers for the purpose of confirming or dissipating any doubts which may have been engendered by these statements and affidavits as to my loyalty. In offering that resolution I have shown, I think conclusively, that there was no disposition on my part to shun the most searching investigation. If the committee propose to confine their investigation exclusively to those statements and ex parte affidavits now before them, in connection with what I may submit for their consideration, it may not be inappropriate for me to express my opinions in regard to them, and I shall do so in the same spirit by which the committee appear to have been actuated in making the request.

As it could not be fairly supposed that I would permit myself to occupy the attitude of self-prosecutor, or that I would assume the task of defending myself when no charge on prima facie evidence had been preferred against me, I trust that I may do so without derogating from the true position which my honor and self-respect demand that I should occupy.

With all due deference, therefore, I submit that as a Senator of the United States for the State of Oregon I am entitled to, and I claim, every presumption of honor, integrity, loyalty, and patriotism that can be claimed by any other Senator until such presumption is overborne by competent testimony. It certainly would be very extraordinary to put an honorable Senator upon trial for expulsion without charges and specifications made with reasonable (if not technical) precision, and supported by testimony subjected to all the tests which human wisdom and human experience have found to be essential for the ascertainment of truth. Should such a case ever arise it is reasonable to suppose that it would not be permitted long to interrupt the order or disturb the decorum of the American Senate. Unless the proceedings of your committee are to be regarded as a preliminary inquiry whether or not charges for expulsion ought to be preferred against me, in what essential particular does this case differ from the one suggested?

The papers referred to you I have again examined with that earnest attention which a deep personal interest in the result of an inquiry must ever stimulate, and with the light reflected upon them by the communication which I had the honor to address to the Committee on the Judiciary, under date of January 17th ultimo, I am unable to discover anything upon which a sufficient charge for expulsion can be predicated, or anything in the nature of evidence which an impartial tribunal could receive as sufficient to justify expulsion from the Senate. Accepting all the statements contained in the letters, affidavits, &c., to be true, and there is merely attributed to me opinions which in the field of politics might be regarded as heresies, and expressions charged upon me which might be characterized as idle, mischievous, and unwise. This suggestion, I need not remind the committee, is not made as palliative upon an admission by me of the truth of any part of these statements, but purely as argumentative and as properly within the scope of my purpose in addressing to them this communication. Guided by this purpose I have in these reflections excluded any denial or admission of anything contained in the papers before the committee, my chief design being accomplished if I shall have succeeded in showing the utter impossibility of making, or even entering upon, a defense of any specific charge or of proffering to rebut evidence when none is presented.

I cannot conclude this brief statement without asserting, as in substance I did in my communication to the Judiciary Committee, that the declarations of my assailants are utterly false in many particulars which might be deemed important, especially the statements of Hull and Law; that the expressions attributed to me in others of the affidavits have been wickedly and maliciously perverted, and that in every respect their declarations are unjust to my real sentiments and at variance with the whole tenor of my life.

Should the committee, however, deem that the public safety and welfare require a formal inquest upon my loyalty and fidelity to the Constitution and Government of my country, I submit with profound respect that justice demands that the general allegations of my assailants should be digested and presented in the form of charges and specifications so that I may have the ordinary and common rights accorded to the humblest citizen when arraigned for trial for the most trivial offense.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN STARK.

Hon. D. CLARK, Chairman.

After considering this statement, desirous to know if the Senator had any further communication for the committee or wished to lay before them any further testimony, the committee caused a note to be addressed to him, of which the following is a copy:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Committee Room on Claims, April 14, 1862.

SIR: At a meeting of the select committee, of which Hon. Mr. Clark is chairman, held at their room this day, your communication of the 10th instant addressed to the committee through its chairman was read and considered, after which it was ordered that a communication be addressed to Mr. Stark requesting him to inform the committee at his earliest convenience whether he desires to submit any further testimony or to make any further statement to the committee in regard to the matters under investigation.

The committee adjourned to Wednesday next at 11 a. m., by which time, if convenient to Mr. Stark, an answer is desired.

By direction of the committee.

N. C. TOWLE, Clerk.

Hon. BENJAMIN STARK,
Senator from Oregon.

The committee met again on the 16th of April, when the following note was received from the Senator from Oregon:

SENATE CHAMBER, April 15, 1862.

SIR: In answer to the note of your committee, dated yesterday, I have to state that in the absence of information from them as to the course which they deem it to be their duty to pursue I have nothing to add to what I have already communicated to them, nor do I propose in the present situation of the subject before them to present any testimony.

With great respect, I am your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN STARK.

The committee then proceeded to consider the allegations and charges contained in the papers which had been submitted to them by the Senate, in connection with his answer and statement, and upon mature deliberation do find the following conclusions from the facts proved, viz:

1st. That for many months prior to the 21st November, 1861, and up to that time, the said Stark was an ardent advocate of the cause of the rebellious States.

2d. That after the formation of the constitution of the Confederate States he openly declared his admiration for it, and advocated the absorption of the loyal States of the Union into the Southern Confederacy under that constitution as the only means of peace, warmly avowing his sympathies with the South.

3d. That the Senator from Oregon is disloyal to the Government of the United States.

In coming to the foregoing conclusion, the committee cheerfully agree to the statement of the Senator in his answer, that, "as a Senator of the United States for the State of Oregon, I am entitled to, and I claim, every presumption of honor, integrity, loyalty, and patriotism that can be claimed by any other Senator, until such presumption is overborne by competent testimony;" and they cheerfully accord to him all the force and benefit of such a presumption; at the same time they are forced, with pain and reluctance, to find such presumption overborne by the array of witnesses which testify in regard to his conduct and declarations. Thirteen witnesses, who are not only unimpeachable, but are among the most respectable people of the city of Portland, where Mr. Stark resides, testify to the truth of the first of the foregoing propositions. They are William H. Rector, William C. Johnson, C. B. Conelon, A. B. Clough, Levi Anderson, Colburn Barrell, Henry Failing, John S. White, W. H. Bamhart, S. P. Reed, H. W. Corbet, Simeon Francis, and Samuel E. Barr. They say "Mr. Stark, who is a resident here, and personally known to us all, has been, for the past twelve months, an ardent advocate of the cause of the rebellious States." It may be objected that these witnesses do not make this statement under oath, and such is the fact; but they nevertheless, in the opinion of the committee, are entitled to belief. Their character for respectability, and the positions of some of them, entitle them to it. They gave their testimony months ago, on the 21st November, 1861. It seems to be fair and unprejudiced. They declare that a sense of duty induces them to make their statement. It has been a long time before the Senate; and, although in his communication to the Committee on the Judiciary, dated the 17th January, 1862, the Senator from Oregon declared "that in a forum, competent to try and determine the issue, he should be able to prove the allegations against his loyalty to be utterly unfounded; and that, in many important particulars, the declarations of his assailants were false," yet when an opportunity has been given to the Senator, upon his own motion, to send for persons and papers to disprove these allegations before a committee legally, if not otherwise, competent, the Senator does not desire these witnesses to be put under oath, nor to be re-examined, nor cross-examined; nor does he offer any rebutting testimony, or express a wish that any should be taken; nor does he, in his statement, filed before the committee, so far as the committee remember, attempt to deny or impeach it—for while he says that the statements of Hull and Law are especially false, he makes no such allegation against these thirteen witnesses, or any one of them. He objects to no one of these witnesses because his statement was not made under oath.

These witnesses, however, do not stand alone, nor does the finding of the committee on this proposition rest solely upon testimony given without the sanctity of an oath.

Wesley C. Hull, upon oath, on the 18th November, 1861, says that, in the month of February previous, he heard Mr. Stark make use of the following language: "If there is to be any war between the North and the South, all my property is for sale at fifty cents on the dollar, and I will go and help the South fight. The Palmetto flag is my flag; the Southern Confederacy is the only legal government in existence; that the United States Government is broken up; that Jeff. Davis is fighting in a good cause, and it will be impossible to defeat him;" that afterwards upon another occasion he heard the said Stark use the following language: "The United States forces may fight the South from one end of their government to the other, but it will amount to nothing; they will close up behind them, and they cannot be conquered. The South is fighting in a good cause, for government and order, and they cannot be conquered."

Henry Law, also on oath, says that he is acquainted with Mr. Stark; that as early as December, 1860, he heard Mr. Stark say "that he did not go one cent on the Stars and Stripes; that the Palmetto flag was his flag, and if there was any issue between the North and South, he would sell all his property and go South."

A. M. Starr, also under oath, on the 20th November, 1861, declared that within the then last two weeks past he had heard Mr. Stark say that there was no United States Government; and also he heard Mr. Stark say, when the President first called for volunteers, "that the United States Government could not support an army of 30,000 in the field for six months; that the people of the loyal States would not back up the Administration in trying to put down this rebellion."

Thirty other witnesses, likewise under oath, say, on the 15th November, 1861, "that Mr. Stark is well known and generally reputed to be an open and avowed friend to the Southern Confederacy as against the Union."

Samuel E. Barr, the magistrate before whom the last-named thirty witnesses made oath, says he is acquainted with each and every one of them, and that they are all men of truth and veracity, and further, that he subscribes to the facts which they stated.

Here are forty-six witnesses, all testifying, materially and directly, to the same substantive fact, to wit, that Mr. Stark has been the advocate of the Southern Confederacy; uncontradicted and unimpeached, except so far as the statement of Mr. Stark may go to that purpose; and the committee are unable to see how a larger number of witnesses could establish the truth of the proposition more firmly. They do not forget, however, that Mr. Stark says that the testimony of two of those witnesses, especially Hull and Law, is false, and he is entitled to any deduction that may be made from their credibility on that account, and to the fact that one of them is evidently mistaken in fixing the time of a particular conversation. They stand, however, with the other witnesses testifying to similar facts, and are uncontradicted by any other person; and the committee can come to no other conclusion than that the facts thus stated by these witnesses are substantially and fully proved, even if the testimony of these two witnesses should be excluded.

The second finding of the committee is proved partly by the declaration of most of these same witnesses, and partly by the distinct and unqualified declaration of the Senator himself to the committee. The same thirteen witnesses above named, in their letter of the 21st November, 1861, say: "He (the Senator from Oregon) has openly avowed his sympathies for the South, declaring the Government disrupted, and openly expressing his admiration for the constitution of the Confederate States, and advocating the absorption of the loyal States of the Union into the Southern Confederacy under that constitution as the only means of restoring peace."

This, these witnesses say, he has done openly. The witnesses live in the same city with him, and there can be no question that they had the means of knowing the conduct, opinions, and declarations of Mr. Stark on these matters.

Mr. Hull testifies, on the 18th November, 1861, that some time after the month of February, 1861, the precise time he does not mention, he heard Mr. Stark say: "The United States forces may fight the South from one end of their government to the other, but it will amount to nothing; they will close up behind them, and they cannot be conquered. The South is fighting in a good cause, for government and order, and they cannot be conquered."

Henry Law, on the 20th November, 1861, says he has heard the said Stark say that he was a secessionist, and all his sympathies were for the South.

John M. Breck, on the 21st of November, 1861, deposes that he and Mr. Stark live in the same place, and that he is personally acquainted with him; that just after the news of the reverses of the national armies at Bull Run, the affiant being at the time standing at the entrance of the Bank Exchange in the city of Portland, did then and there distinctly hear and see the said Benjamin Stark drink a toast in company with a well-known secessionist, to the following effect, viz: "Beauregard," or "Beau-Regard;" that he cannot certainly say that the said Stark alluded to the notorious rebel of that name, but such was his understanding, never having previously heard said Stark use the latter phrase.

It is due to the Senator from Oregon to state that on referring to this testimony before the committee he declared that it was not true. He did not, however, say that the witness was not a truthful man, and worthy of belief under oath, but that he was mistaken, or misunderstood what was said. That he might have drank the toast with some one, and have said, "My regards to you, sir," and that expression been taken for what the witness testifies. But the committee deem it proper to remark, in justice to the witness and to truth, that the witness says "he did then and there distinctly hear and see the said Stark, in company with a well-known secessionist, drink the toast." &c. And here is presented a touchstone for ascertaining the truth of the witness's statement. The witness says he drank this toast with a well-known secessionist—and with such a person, the committee submit, he would be likely to drink it if he drank it at all—and this person would know whether or not Mr. Breck is correct in his statement. Mr. Stark had it in his power, and at his option, without expense to him, to have summoned Breck before the committee, and inquired of him who the person was with whom he, Mr. Stark, drank the toast. He then could have summoned that person before the committee and ascertained the truth or falsity of Mr. Breck's statement. Yet this he entirely failed or neglected to do, not because he was unaware of the importance of the testimony, for his attention was attracted to it, and he had taken pains himself to deny it. This testimony, therefore, is entitled to credibility, for the Senator had the means placed at his power of overthrowing it if incorrect, and failed to do so. If, then, this statement of Mr. Breck's be true, how completely and to what extent does it show the sympathies of the Senator were with the rebels! How full of disloyalty must have been the heart of the Senator to the Union cause, thus, in company with a well-known secessionist, exultantly to drink a toast to the man who had planted the batteries against and breached the fortifications of his own Government—and such a Government! and who led a host which slaughtered his fellow-citizens, mutilated their dead bodies, and struck with traitorous swords at the heart of the country?

Thirty-one other witnesses, whose names the committee have, say that Mr. Stark is well known and reputed to be an open and avowed friend of the Southern Confederacy as against the Union.

Peter Smith, on the 21st of November, 1861, deposes that Mr. Stark maintained before him that any State had a right to secede from the rest of the Union, * * * and there was no constitutional right to coerce them into submission.

On the 29th of January, 1862, Joseph Lane appeared before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and testified that in a conversation with Bishop Scott he heard Mr. Stark say that his sympathies were with the South, and that they were right. He does not undertake to give the precise words of the conversation, which occurred in June, 1861. This witness Mr. Stark had the opportunity of cross-examining, and here again he had the opportunity, if Mr. Lane had been mistaken, to have corrected him. He might have called Bishop Scott before the committee and inquired if he had any such conversation with Mr. Stark or heard him make any such declarations, but he neglected entirely the opportunity of ascertaining the truth or of contradicting the testimony against him.

The committee, however, did not rely entirely upon the testimony of witnesses for this finding. Mr. Stark in the presence of the committee, at one of their meetings, distinctly admitted and said that now he would be willing that the loyal States should be absorbed under the confederated constitution for the sake of peace.

The committee were equally pained and surprised at such an expression, but could not fail to perceive how pungent a force it gave to much of the testimony against him; nor could they fail to come to the conclusion, however disagreeable.

Thirdly. That the Senator from Oregon is disloyal to the Government of the United States.

If the first two findings of the committee be correct and the testimony of the witnesses be received and credited, this third finding results almost as a matter of necessity. The Southern Confederacy is the work of rebellion; those who formed it are in arms against the Government of the United States. Its constitution is the product of treason. It is antagonistic, inconsistent, and hostile to the Government of the Union. If rebellion be successful and the Southern Confederacy be established, the Government of the United States must be overthrown and destroyed in nearly one-half its legitimate jurisdiction. Those, therefore, who advocate and support the course of the Southern Confederacy must be deemed opposed to the Government of the United States and disloyal thereto. The truly loyal citizen cannot desire and will not permit a rebellion in any of the States to succeed. Success to the one is the disruption, overthrow, and defeat of the other; especially when the two sections are in arms will the true citizen give all his sympathies, his efforts, and his prayers to the maintenance of a Government which has diffused its blessings so bounteously and so widely as our own. There may be some excuse or palliation for those who, living in rebellious States, are swept away or absorbed by the terrible events there occurring; but there certainly can be none for one who, like the Senator from Oregon, remote from the scene of strife, voluntarily, among a people disposed to be loyal, thus sympathizes with and advocates the cause of rebellion.

By disloyalty the committee mean the want of fidelity to his allegiance to the country, and a disregard of the duty he owes her in this her hour of need and peril.

Now, if it be loyal to advocate the cause of the seceded States, then the Senator from Oregon may be loyal. If it be loyal to sympathize with the rebels, to declare that they are right, and cannot be coerced; to desire for them peace, that they may perfect and carry out their schemes, then may the Senator from Oregon be loyal. If it be loyal not only to express an admiration for the constitution which the rebels have adopted to combine their strength, and make it effectual for the permanent disruption of the American Union and the permanent establishment of their own confederacy, but also to desire the absorption of the other States under it, thus, so to speak, nationalizing treason and making the Government succumb to treason, rather than treason to the Government, then may the Senator from Oregon be loyal. If it be loyal, when the President called for volunteers to save the capital from seizure and suppress rebellion, discouragingly to assert that the United States could not support an army of thirty thousand men, nor would the people sustain the Administration in trying to put down the rebellion; if it be loyal, when the fortifications of the country are battered down by the cannon of domestic foes, and our soldiers are defeated, put to rout and slain, and their dead bodies mutilated and buried, "to drink the health" of the traitor who led the host that perpetrated these enormities, then may the Senator from Oregon be loyal.

But if, as the committee think, such conduct and declarations, at the time when the Government was accepting war as a dire necessity, and struggling for its very existence, could only proceed from a heart sadly and wickedly inclined to sympathize with treason, and show itself false to every duty and deaf to every call of patriotism, then is the finding of the committee fully warranted by the evidence.

"No man can serve two masters." Sympathy with rebellion must shut out patriotism from the heart. It can only exist where the other is not. No man can be true to his country who would do or say aught to aid a conspiracy so wicked, so malignant, so remorseless, and so traitorous as the present rebellion.

The Senator from Oregon cannot be ignorant of the aim and design of the seceding States. They confederated together to break up the Federal Government. They openly proclaimed their determination; and if the Senator aided them by word or deed, he did it with a full knowledge that it was a blow at his country's existence.

The committee do not forget that it is asserted by the Senator that many of the papers referred to the committee are from his bitterest political enemies; and did the findings of the committee rest upon such papers alone, much consideration should be given this statement.

But, turning from these papers of his political enemies to the Senator's own letter to the Democratic mass convention held in Linn County, Oregon, June 5, 1861, the committee find sad evidence of the same spirit animating the contents and dictating the expressions. "Civil war cannot avert disunion;" "Subjugation cannot prolong the Union;" "To subjugate the South, were that even possible, would be the establishment of a military despotism," are expressions found in this letter, and so marvelously like many of those attributed by the witnesses to the Senator that there is no difficulty in believing that they all belong to the same family and have a common parent. And they all are calculated to encourage the rebellion, and discourage the efforts to suppress it. Whoever may read this letter, mutilated as it is, keeping in mind that it was written about the time he is said to have uttered the expressions attributed to him by the witnesses, will the more readily believe that the statement of the witnesses closely accords with the evidence furnished by the Senator himself.

Indeed, this letter of June, 1861, and the statement of the Senator to the committee have added much to the weight of the other proof. The first tallies in sentiment and spirit with the witnesses; the other, though made when the Senator was under an accusation of disloyalty in papers referred to the committee upon his own motion, and though the committee by inviting that statement intended to give the Senator an opportunity to express his sympathy with his suffering country and menaced Government, and to remove so far as he could in that way any impeachment of his loyalty, is as barren of all such expressions as a bill of indictment. There is not in it a paragraph, nor a sentence, nor a line such as must spontaneously have burst out from a loyal heart under such an accusation. True, he speaks of being entitled to the presumptions of loyalty, but there is no manly declaration of any determination to stand by the country in weal or woe or to give life or fortune or any assistance whatever to her requirements. In Oregon he was frequent and open in his expressions of sympathy for the rebels. He was, say the witnesses, the advocate of their cause. But here he is as silent as the grave. Though accused of disloyalty, though the country "bleeds at every pore," though she imploringly raises her hands to him in his high place for aid and succor—he has never a word in his statement, nor an expression, sentence, or line from which a drop of sympathy can be wrung, unless it be in his assertion that "in every respect their declarations are unjust to my real sentiments and at variance with the whole tenor of my life."

What those sentiments are he does not tell us, nor have the committee any means of knowing by any evidence before them. If he had declared them to the committee, asserting his loyalty to the Government, the committee would have given him the full benefit of them; and perhaps they might have gone far to have removed the unfavorable conclusions to which the committee have come. But in the absence of any such declarations the committee could only pass on the evidence that was before them, giving him the full benefit of every presumption that can arise in his favor, and of every deduction that should be made for a conflict of testimony.

"He that is not for us is against us" are the words of inspiration, and never more applicable than on occasions like the present. It is quite true the Senator was under no obligation to use any such expressions in his statement, but the committee cannot but believe that had the feelings existed which would have prompted them they could not have been confined in a patriotic heart—they would have found expression.

Upon taking his seat in the Senate, the Senator took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and it may be objected he would not have done so if not loyal to the Government. What were the reservations, what the limitations or interpretations, with which the Senator took that oath the committee do not inquire; for the Senator does not assert that his feelings and views have changed since the witnesses testified. He does not pretend that he is more loyal now than when he declared his sympathies were with the South, that they were right and could not be coerced. And the committee remember and know that in their presence, since the taking of that oath, and since the institution of this inquiry, the Senator boldly and without condition declared he would be willing the loyal States should be absorbed under the constitution of the Confederacy for the sake of peace—that is, that the Constitution of our fathers, which he had just sworn to support, should be cast out of its rightful inheritance by this bastard sprout of a gigantic rebellion, which should "reign in its stead."

Could the traitors desire more, to wit, peace and the adoption of their government?

It is the aim of their efforts; their avowed intent and purpose. No man can yield it, unless compelled by dire necessity, and not be liable to an impeachment of his loyalty.

All true lovers of the country desire peace, but he who would seek it through its destruction and overthrow must be either a craven or disloyal citizen.

The committee are, therefore, compelled to dismiss this consideration, and adopt the foregoing findings; adding that the appearance of the Senator before the committee, his singular declarations, statements, and conduct, have done much to strengthen the last conclusion of the committee.

Itwould have been far pleasanter to them not to have done so, and they hoped, upon entering upon this investigation, the Senator would have made such proofs and statements as would have removed from him all suspicion of disloyalty. But he has failed to do so, and the duty was left to the committee to judge only upon what was before them. From that duty there could be no shrinking in a time like this; and the committee have endeavored to discharge it thoroughly and fearlessly, and now submit their conclusions to the Senate.

DAN'L CLARK.
J. M. HOWARD.
JOSEPH A. WRIGHT.
JOHN SHERMAN.

Concurring in the first two conclusions of the majority of the committee, I am yet constrained, not without hesitation, to differ with them in their third and last conclusion. Distrusting all ex parte testimony, especially in regard to expressions uttered in the heat of high political excitement, seeing that the sentiments and opinions thus attributed to Mr. Stark are virtually denied and repudiated by him in his written statement before the committee; remembering that since it is alleged those conversations took place, and those expressions were uttered, Mr. Stark, in taking his seat as a Senator, has purged himself of these sinister allegations by taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and especially fearing the danger of making mere difference of opinion, however wide and fundamental, a test of fidelity to the Government, I am not prepared to say that Mr. Stark is now disloyal.

W. J. WILLEY.

WEDNESDAY, May 7, 1862.

Mr. Sumner submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon, who has been found by a committee of this body to be disloyal to the Government of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, expelled from the Senate."

[The debate is found on page 1983 of the Congressional Globe, part 3, 2d sess. 37th Cong.]

FRIDAY, June 6, 1862.

On motion by Mr. Sumner that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him for the expulsion of the Hon. Benjamin Stark from the Senate, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilmot, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Browning, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harris, Kennedy, Latham, McDougall, Nesmith, Powell, Rice, Saulsbury, Simmons, Ten Eyck, and Willey.

[Thirty-eighth Congress and first session Thirty-ninth Congress.]

WILLIAM M. FISHBACK, ELISHA BAXTER, AND WILLIAM D. SNOW,

of Arkansas.

May 21, 1864, the credentials of Mr. Fishback, elected to fill the unexpired term, ending March 3, 1865, of William K. Sebastian, expelled, were presented; and May 31 the credentials of Mr. Baxter, elected to fill the unexpired term, ending March 3, 1867, of Charles B. Mitchell, expelled, were presented. June 13, the oath of office not having been administered, their credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. At the same time a joint resolution for the recognition of the free State government of the State of Arkansas, which had been presented to the Senate June 10, was referred to the committee. June 27, the committee reported in regard to the election of the Senators substantially as follows: August 16, 1861, the President had declared the inhabitants of Arkansas, except those of such parts thereof as should maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union, or might be from time to time occupied and controlled by United States forces, to be in a state of insurrection. At the date of the proclamation no part of the State was occupied and controlled by forces of the United States, nor did the inhabitants of any part of the State publicly maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union. Hence at that time a state of civil war existed between the inhabitants of Arkansas and the United States, and there was not then any organized authority competent to elect Senators of the United States. It is claimed, however, that since that period the greater portion of the State has been thus occupied, and that the inhabitants, loyal to the Union, have reorganized their State government, and have a right through their legislature to choose Senators. The question to be determined by the Senate is, Was the body electing Messrs. Fishback and Baxter the legislature of Arkansas? Less than one-fourth of the number of persons who voted for President in 1860 took part in the reorganization of the State government. This, however, would not be fatal to the reorganization if the State was free from military control, which is not the case. At the time the claimants were elected, and at this time, the State is occupied by hostile armies. While this state of things continues, and the right to exercise armed authority is claimed and exerted by the military power, it cannot be said that a civil government, set up and continued only by the sufferance of the military, is that republican form of government which the Constitution requires the United States to guarantee to every State in the Union. When the rebellion shall have been so far suppressed in the State that the loyal inhabitants thereof shall maintain a State government by the aid of and not in subordination to the military, they shall then and not before be entitled to representation in Congress. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution: "Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas." This resolution passed the Senate June 29, 1864, by a vote of 27 yeas to 6 nays.

The joint resolution above referred to was reported adversely at the same time that the report on the credentials was presented. In the next session of Congress a similar joint resolution was submitted and referred to the same committee, but was not reported. The proceedings of the Senate relating to these joint resolutions are not included in the extracts given below.

March 7, 1865, the credentials of Mr. Snow, elected for the term succeeding that for which Mr. Fishback had been elected, were presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee recommended that the question be postponed to the next session, and until Congress should take action in regard to the recognition of the alleged existing State government in Arkansas. No action was taken. February 26, 1866, the credentials of Messrs. Baxter and Snow having been taken from the files of the Senate, a motion was made that they be referred again to the committee. It was ordered that they lie on the table. No further action was taken on the credentials.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 38th Cong. and 1st sess. 39th Cong.; the report of the committee on on the credentials of Messrs. Fishback and Baxter from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 38th Cong. (No. 34); the report on the credentials of Mr. Snow from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 38th Cong. (No. 1, special session); also the proceedings of the Senate from the Journals relating to the payment of mileage to the claimants.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

[First session of the Thirty-eighth Congress.]

CREDENTIALS OF MESSRS. FISHBACK AND BAXTER.

SATURDAY, May 21, 1864.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, presented the credentials of the Hon. William M. Fishback, elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Arkansas to fill the unexpired term of the Hon. William K. Sebastian, who was expelled by a resolution of the Senate of July 11, 1861; which were read.

On motion by Mr. Conness that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, May 25, 1864.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. Conness, the 21st instant, to refer the credentials of the Hon. William M. Fishback to the Committee on the Judiciary; and

On motion by Mr. Fessenden,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 2458, 2459 of the Congressional Globe, part 3, 1st sess. 38th Cong.]

TUESDAY, May 31, 1864.

Mr. Foot presented the credentials of the Hon. Elisha Baxter, elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Arkansas to fill the unexpired term of the Hon. Charles B. Mitchell, who was expelled by a resolution of the Senate July 11, 1861.

The credentials were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

MONDAY, June 13, 1864.

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, that the joint resolution, together with the credentials of the Hon. William M. Fishback and the Hon. Elisha Baxter, Senators-elect from the State of Arkansas, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

* * * * * * *

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. Lane, of Kansas,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Wade that the joint resolution and the credentials lay on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 32.

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Chandler, Howard, Richardson, Sumner, and Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson.

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. Lane, of Kansas, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was Ordered, That the joint resolution, with the credentials of the Hon. William M. Fishback and the Hon. Elisha Baxter, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, presented a proclamation of Major-General Steele, commanding the Department of Arkansas, declaring that peace has been so far restored in Arkansas as to enable the people to institute proceedings for the restoration of the civil government, and issuing regulations for an election to be held for the adoption or rejection of the State constitution adopted by the convention of citizens of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.*

TUESDAY, June 21, 1864.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, presented a letter† of William M. Fishback, addressed to him, giving a detailed account of his conduct during the present rebellion, and defending himself against charges of disloyalty; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, June 27, 1864.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. William M. Fishback and the Hon. Elisha Baxter, elected Senators of the United States by the legislature of the State of Arkansas, submitted a report (No. 94), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas."

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Foster, Ten Eyck, Harris, Howard, Bayard, and Powell.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JUNE 27, 1864.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter, claiming seats from the State of Arkansas, report:

That the credentials presented are in due form, purporting to be under the seal of the State of Arkansas, and to be signed by Isaac Murphy, governor thereof; and if the right to seats were to be determined by an inspection of the credentials Messrs. Fishback and Baxter would be entitled to be sworn as members of this body. It is, however, admitted by the persons claiming seats, and known to the country, that in the spring of 1861 the State of Arkansas, through its constituted authorities, undertook to secede from the Union, set up a government in hostility to the United States, and maintain the same by force of arms. Congress, in view of the condition of affairs in Arkansas and some other States similarly situated, passed an act July 13, 1861, authorizing the President, in case of an insurrection in any State against the laws of the United States, and when the insurgents claimed to act under the authority of the State, and such claim was not repudiated, nor the insurrection suppressed by the persons exercising the functions of government in such State, to declare the inhabitants of such State, or part thereof where such insurrection existed, to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and that thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens of the United States, except under license and upon certain conditions, should cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility should continue.

In pursuance of this act the President, August 16, 1861, issued his proclamation declaring the inhabitants of the State of Arkansas, except the inhabitants of such parts thereof as should maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or might be from time to time occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents, to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, and that all commercial intercourse between them and citizens of other States was and would be unlawful, except when carried on under special license, until such insurrection should cease. At the date of this proclamation no part of the State of Arkansas was occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States, nor did the inhabitants of any part of the State at that time publicly maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution. Hence, upon the issuing of said proclamation, a state of hostility or civil war existed between the inhabitants of the State of Arkansas and the United States, and there was not at that time any organized authority in Arkansas, loyal to the Constitution, competent to choose or appoint Senators of the United States. It is claimed, however, that since that period the State, or the greater portion of it, has been occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of the insurgents, and that the inhabitants of said State, loyal to the Union and the Constitution, have reorganized their State government, and have the right, through the legislature they have instituted, to choose two Senators for said State.

The Constitution declares that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years," and makes each House "the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members." In the investigation of the claimants' right to seats the first question to be determined is, Was the body by whom they were elected clothed with authority to elect Senators; in other words, was it, in a constitutional sense, "the legislature of Arkansas?"

A question similar to this arose some years since between Robbins and Potter, each claiming to have been elected Senator by the legislature of Rhode Island, though by different bodies. In that case the Senate was called upon to decide, and did decide, which of the two bodies, each claiming to be legitimate, was the legislature contemplated by the Constitution. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Luther vs. Borden, growing out of the political difficulties in Rhode Island in 1841 and 1842, held that "when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government."

The claimants laid before the committee a statement of the circumstances attending the assembling of the body by which they were elected, in which, after detailing the condition of the State while under rebel control, and prior to September, 1863, they say:

"Upon the advent of the Union army the rebels in the State, guerrillas and all, for the most part left with their armies, leaving about two-thirds of the State comparatively free from guerrilla depredation.

"The Union men came flocking from the mountains, where they had lain for two years, to the Federal standard, and nearly every man whom the medical examiners would receive joined the Federal army.

"Those who were rejected (and their number was enormous, their constitutions having been broken by exposure and their hardships), and those whom circumstances prevented from joining the army, found themselves, so far as law was concerned, in a state of chaos. Many of them, living remote from military posts, had not even the protection of military law.

"Immediately they began to agitate the question of a reorganization of their State government. They first moved in primary meetings, and on the 30th of October, 1863, they held a mass meeting in the city of Fort Smith, in which some twenty counties are said to have been represented, and at which they called upon all the counties in the State to elect delegates (after having elected commissioners of election) to a State convention, to be held in the city of Little Rock on the 8th day of January, 1864, for the purpose of so amending the constitution as to abolish slavery. Simultaneously with this meeting meetings were held in a number of other counties. In every single one (in ignorance of the action of others in many instances) they declared for a convention and for the abolition of slavery.

"Commissioners of election were first elected, and they held the elections for the delegates.

"All this was prior to the President's amnesty proclamation.

"When the convention met forty-five delegates were present, representing about one-half of the State. (Several of the delegates failed to attend.) They repudiated the rebel debt, State and Confederate, abolished slavery, and submitted the constitution to the people for their ratification. They also provided for taking the vote for State and county officers and members of the legislature at the same time with the vote for the ratification of the constitution.

"The result of those elections was 12,177 for the constitution and 226 against it, an election of State and county officers, an election of delegates to the lower house of Congress, and a representation in the State legislature from forty-six of the fifty-four counties of the State."

The number of persons in Arkansas who voted for President in 1860 was 54,043, less than one-fourth of whom, as appears from the statement of the claimants, took part in the reorganization of the State government. This, however, would not be fatal to the reorganization, if all who were loyal to the Union had an opportunity to participate, and the State was free from military control. Such, however, is understood not to have been the case. The President had not then, nor has he up to this time, recalled his proclamation, which declared the inhabitants of Arkansas in a state of insurrection against the United States, nor was there any evidence before the committee that said insurrection had ceased or been suppressed. At the time when the body which chose the claimants was elected, when it assembled, and at this time, the State of Arkansas is occupied by hostile armies, which exercise supreme authority within the districts subject to their control. While a portion of Arkansas is at this very time, as the committee are informed, in the actual possession and subject to the control of the enemies of the United States, other parts of the State are only held in subordination to the laws of the Union by the strong arm of military power. While this state of things continues, and the right to exercise armed authority over a large part of the State is claimed and exerted by the military power, it cannot be said that a civil government, set up and continued only by the sufferance of the military, is that republican form of government which the Constitution requires the United States to guarantee to every State in the Union.

When the rebellion in Arkansas shall have been so far suppressed that the loyal inhabitants thereof shall be free to re-establish their State government upon a republican foundation, or to recognize the one already set up, and by the aid and not in subordination to the military to maintain the same, they will then, and not before, in the opinion of your committee, be entitled to a representation in Congress, and to participate in the administration of the Federal Government. Believing that such a state of things did not at the time the claimants were elected, and does not now, exist in the State of Arkansas, the committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1864.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators elect from the State of Arkansas.

On motion by Mr. Wade to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to to-morrow, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 244) to guarantee to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. Wade, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Clark, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Sherman, and Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson.

After debate,

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 6.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Doolittle, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, and Pomeroy.

So it was

Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1865.]

CREDENTIALS OF MR. SNOW.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1865.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, presented the credentials of the Hon. William D. Snow, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Arkansas for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1865.

Objection to the reception of the credentials being made by Mr. Howard,

The President pro tempore submitted the question to the decision of the Senate; and, on the question, Shall the credentials be received?

After debate, and the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 1427–1429 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 38th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1865.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the credentials of the Hon. William D. Snow, yesterday presented by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, the reception of which was objected to by Mr. Howard; and

After debate,

Mr. Howard having withdrawn his objection to their reception,

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas,

Ordered, That the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[The debate is found on pages 1429–1432 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 38th Cong.]

THURSDAY, March 9, 1865.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of William D. Snow, claiming to have been elected a Senator, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865, submitted a report (No. 1), recommending that the further consideration of the subject be postponed to the next session of Congress.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Harris, Collamer, Sherman, Johnson, Williams, and Hendricks.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 9, 1865.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of William D. Snow, claiming to have been elected a Senator from the State of Arkansas for six years from the 4th of March instant, report:

That, in the year 1861, the constituted authorities of the State of Arkansas undertook to withdraw that State from the Union, and so far succeeded in the attempt as by force of arms to expel from the State for a time the authority of the United States, and set up a government in hostility thereto, and, in pursuance of an act of Congress, the inhabitants of said State have since been declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States. The committee therefore recommend that the question of the admission of Mr. Snow to a seat be postponed to the next session of Congress, and until Congress shall take action in regard to the recognition of the alleged existing State government in Arkansas.

[First session of the Thirty-ninth Congress.]

CREDENTIALS OF MESSRS. BAXTER AND SNOW.

MONDAY, February 26, 1866.

A motion was made by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, that the credentials of Elisha Baxter and William D. Snow, as Senators-elect from the State of Arkansas, be taken from the files of the Senate, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A division of the question was called for by Mr. Clark; and,

On the question to agree to the first branch of the motion, to wit, that the credentials of Elisha Baxter and William D. Snow as Senators-elect from the State of Arkansas be taken from the files of the Senate, it was determined in the affirmative; and,

On the question to agree to the second branch of the motion, to wit, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary,

On motion by Mr. Clark that the credentials lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 17.

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, and Van Winkle.

So it was Ordered, That the credentials lie on the table.

* * * * * * *

A motion was made by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, to admit the Senators-elect from the State of Arkansas to seats on the floor of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. Wade that the motion of Mr. Lane, of Kansas, lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 18.

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Van Winkle, and Willey.

So it was Ordered, That the motion lie on the table.

MILEAGE TO CLAIMANTS.

[First session of the Thirty-eighth Congress.]

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1864.

Mr. Trumbull asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to submit the following resolution:

"Resolved That the Secretary be instructed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, the usual mileage of Senators to Elisha Baxter and William M. Fishback, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Arkansas, at the first session of this Congress."

The said resolution was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read the third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass

[Second session of the Thirty-eighth Congress.]

FRIDAY, March 3, 1865.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the usual mileage to Elisha Baxter and William M. Fishback, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Arkansas, and Charles Smith and R. King Cutler, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Louisiana, at the second session of this Congress."

[Special session of Senate, March, 1865.]

MONDAY, March 6, 1865.

Mr. Lane, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution for consideration (the same that was submitted March 3).

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1865.

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 6th instant, to pay mileage to certain claimants to seats in the Senate from the States of Arkansas and Louisiana; and

The resolution having been modified, on the motion of Mr. Lane, of Kansas, to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the usual mileage to Elisha Baxter, William M. Fishback, and William D. Snow, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Arkansas, and Charles Smith and R. King Cutler, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Louisiana, at the second session of the last Congress,"

Ordered, That the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1865.

Mr. Morrill, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution to pay to certain persons claiming seats in the Senate as Senators from Arkansas and Louisiana the mileage of Senators from those States, reported the resolution without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, asking that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Morrill, Ramsey, and Henderson.]

The Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution that the Secretary be instructed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the usual mileage to Elisha Baxter, William M. Fishback, and William D. Snow, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Arkansas, and Charles Smith and R. King Cutler, respectively, as claimants for seats in the Senate from Louisiana, at the second session of the last Congress, having attentively considered the same, report that the committee conceive their authority to be limited by law to the auditing of accounts for the ordinary contingent expenses of the Senate, and that mileage is payable only to Senators as members of Congress, and not as claimants for seats in the Senate, without an express order of the Senate. The terms of the resolution exclude the inference that the mileage therein contemplated is either ordinary contingent expenses of the Senate or mileage of Senators—members of Congress. Not regarding the resolution in the nature of an order of the Senate to the committee to audit the mileage of the claimants, and failing to perceive any authority of law for allowing it, they report the resolution back to the Senate, and respectfully ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1865.

On motion by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to certain persons claiming to be Senators duly elected from the States of Arkansas and Louisiana the mileage of Senators from those States; and,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Wilson that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 12.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Norton, Nye, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Yates.

So the motion was agreed to.

[Thirty-eighth Congress—Second session.]

R. KING CUTLER AND CHARLES SMITH, AND MICHAEL HAHN, of Louisiana.

December 7, 1864, the credentials of Mr. Cutler, elected to succeed Mr. Slidell, whose term had expired March 3, 1861, and the credentials of Mr. Smith, elected to fill the unexpired term, ending March 3, 1865, of Mr. Benjamin, retired, were presented. At the same time there was presented a memorial of citizens of Louisiana remonstrating against their admission to seats in the Senate. The credentials and memorial were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. January 11, 1865, the committee reported that the claimants were duly elected, and that, but for the fact that, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed July 13, 1861, the inhabitants of the State had been declared in a state of insurrection, which condition of things had not ceased at the time of the reorganization of the State government and the election of the claimants, they would recommend their immediate admission to their seats; that the inhabitants of the State having been declared in a state of insurrection in pursuance of a law passed by the two Houses of Congress, the committee deemed it improper for the Senate to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana till by some joint action of both Houses there should be some recognition of an existing State government; that they recommend the adoption of an accompanying joint resolution that the United States recognize the State government referred to as the legitimate government of the State. This resolution was debated, but no action was taken on it, and the claimants were not admitted to seats. The proceedings of the Senate relating to the joint resolution are not included in the extracts given below.

March 2, 1865, the credentials of Mr Hahn, elected for the term succeeding that for which Mr. Smith had been elected, were presented. A motion was made that they be laid on the table. Objection being made to their reception, the Senate voted to lay this motion on the table. March 9, the credentials were taken from the files and presented to the Senate, and it was ordered that the further consideration of them be postponed to the next session. No further action was taken on the credentials.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to the credentials of the claimants from Senate Journal, 2d sess. 38th Cong., and the report of the committee, with the exception of certain accompanying documents, from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 38th Cong., No. 117.

There were no debates in regard to the credentials of the claimants. The debates on the adoption of the joint resolution reported by the committee are found on pages 1011, 1061–1070, 1094–1099, 1101–1111 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 38th Cong., 2d sess.

Documents relating to the case are found in Senate Miscellaneous, 2d sess. 38th Cong., Nos. 1, 2, and 9.

Mileage was not allowed to the claimants. For the proceedings of the Senate on a resolution to pay them mileage see latter part of preceding case of Fishback, Baxter, and Snow, page 246.

CREDENTIALS OF MESSRS. CUTLER AND SMITH.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1864.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Hon. Michael Hahn, governor of the State of Louisiana, communicating the credentials of the Hon. Charles Smith and the Hon. R. King Cutler, Senators-elect from that State to the Congress of the United States, with copies of the proceedings of the general assembly of Louisiana in reference to their election; which was read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. Morggn presented the credentials of the Hon. Charles Smith and the Hon. R. King Cutler, Senators-elect from the State of Louisiana to the Congress of the United States, with copies of the proceedings of the general assembly of Louisiana in reference to their election.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

Mr. Wade presented a memorial of citizens of Louisiana remonstrating against the admission of Senators or Representatives from the pretended State of Louisiana into the Congress of the United States and the reception of any electoral vote of that State in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and praying the passage of an act guaranteeing republican government in the insurrectionary States.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

THURSDAY, December 8, 1864.

On motion by Mr. Morgan,

Ordered, That the credentials of the Hon. Charles Smith and the Hon. R. King Cutler, Senators-elect from the State of Louisiana, and the proceedings of the legislature of that State in reference to their election, yesterday presented to the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. Wade,

Ordered, That the memorial of citizens of Louisiana remonstrating against the admission of Senators or Representatives from the State of Louisiana to seats in the Senate or House of Representatives, yesterday presented by him, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1865.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary certain evidence before them relating to the right to seats of Messrs. Cutler and Smith as Senators from the State of Louisiana."

SATURDAY, February 18, 1865.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. Charles Smith and the Hon. R. King Cutler, elected Senators by the legislature of Louisiana, and a memorial of citizens of Louisiana remonstrating against the admission of Senators or Representatives from the State of Louisiana into the Congress of the United States, submitted a report (No. 127), accompanied by a joint resolution (S. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana.

The resolution was read, and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Foster, Ten Eyck, Harris, Foot, Powell, and Johnson.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 18, 1865.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trumbull made the following report (to accompany joint resolution S. No. 117):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of R. King Cutler and Charles Smith, claiming seats from the State of Louisiana, report:

That in the early part of 1861 the constituted authorities of the State of Louisiana undertook to withdraw that State from the Union, and so far succeeded in the attempt as by force of arms to expel from the State for a time the authority of the United States, and set up a government in hostility thereto.

Since that time the United States, as a necessity to the maintaining of its legitimate authority in Louisiana as one of the States of the Union, has been compelled to take possession thereof by its military forces, and, in the absence of any local organizations or civil magistrates loyal to the Union, temporarily to govern the same by military power.

While a large portion of the State, embracing more than two-thirds of its population, was thus under the control of the military power, steps were taken with its sanction, and to some extent under its direction, for the reorganization of a State government loyal to the Government of the United States. The first action had looking to such reorganization was a registration of the loyal persons within the limits of military control entitled to vote under the constitution and laws of Louisiana at the beginning of the rebellion. The lists thus made up contain the names of between fifteen and eighteen thousand voters, which is represented to be more than half the number of voters in the same parishes previous to the rebellion, and more than two-thirds of the voting population within the same localities at the time the registry was taken. The next step taken in the reorganization of the State government was the election of State officers on the 22d of February, 1864, under the auspices of the military authority acting in conjunction with prominent and influential citizens. At this election 11,414 votes were polled, 808 of which were cast by soldiers and sailors, citizens of Louisiana, who would not have been entitled to vote under the constitution of Louisiana as it existed prior to the rebellion, for the sole reason that they were in the military service, but who possessed in other respects all the qualifications of voters required by that instrument. The balance, 10,606, were legal voters under the constitution of the State prior to the rebellion. The third step in the reorganization of the State government was to call a convention for the amendment of the constitution of the State. Delegates to this convention were elected March 28, 1864, under the joint and harmonious direction of the military authorities, and the State officers who had been elected on the 22d February previous. In a paper submitted to the committtee by Major-General Banks he states that delegates were apportioned to every election district in the State, both within and beyond the lines, so that if beyond the lines of the army the people of the State had chosen to participate in that election, the delegates might have been received if they had shown themselves loyal to the Government. They were about 150 in number. All elections subsequent to that for delegates have been ordered and controlled by the representatives of the people.

* A reference to certain documents accompanying the report and not here printed is given in the head-note.

In the organization of the convention it was provided that a majority of the whole number apportioned to the State, if every district within and beyond the lines had been represented, should constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Every vote in the convention, from a question of order to the ratification of the constitution, was conducted under this rule, and was approved by a majority of all the delegates apportioned to the State if every district had been represented.

The delegates met in convention, in the city of New Orleans, on the 6th day of April, 1864, remained in session till July 23, 1864, and adopted a constitution, republican in form and in entire harmony with the Constitution of the United States and the great principles of human liberty.

This constitution was submitted, by the convention which adopted it, to the people for ratification on the first Monday of September, 1864, and adopted by a vote of 6,836 for to 1,566 against it.

At the same time the vote was taken on the adoption of the constitution a legislature was elected, representing all those parishes of the State reclaimed from insurgent control, and embracing about two-thirds of its population. This legislature assembled at New Orleans on the 3d day of October, 1864, and proceeded to put in operation a State government by providing for levying and collecting taxes, the establishment of tribunals for the administration of justice, the adoption of a system of education, and such other measures as were necessary to the re-establishment of a State government in harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States. The State government thus inaugurated has been in succcessful operation since the period of its establishment, and your committee are assured that if no exterior hostile force is permitted to enter the State, the local State government is fully equal to the maintaining of peace and tranquillity throughout the State in subordination to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The manner in which the new State government was inaugurated is not wholly free from objection. The local State authorities having rebelled against the Government, and there being no State or local officers in existence loyal to its authority, in taking the initiatory steps for a reorganization some irregularities were unavoidable, and the number of voters participating in this reorganization is less than would have been desirable. Yet, when we take into consideration the large number of voters who had left the State in consequence of the rebellion, who had fallen in battle, or were absent at the time of the election, both in the Union and rebel armies, and the difficulties attending the obtaining of a full vote from those remaining, in consequence of the unsettled condition of affairs in the State, and the further fact that the adoption of the amended constitution was not seriously opposed, and therefore the question of its ratification not calculated to call out a full vote, the number of votes cast is perhaps as large as could have been expected, and the State government which has been reorganized, as your committee believe, fairly represents a majority of the loyal voters of the State.

Appended hereto is a copy of the various orders and proclamations issued in regard to the election of State officers, delegates to the constitutional convention, and members of the legislature, and also a copy of election laws and instructions relative to the duties of commissioners of elections, issued for the guidance of officers in conducting said election.

Messrs. Cutler and Smith, the claimants for seats, were duly elected Senators by the legislature which convened on the 3d day of October, 1864, and but for the fact that, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed on the 13th day of July, 1861, the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States and all commercial intercourse between them and the citizens of other States declared to be unlawful, which condition of things had not ceased at the time of the reorganization of the State government and the election of Messrs. Cutler and Smith, your committee would recommend their immediate admission to seats.

The persons in possession of the local authorities of Louisiana having rebelled against the authority of the United States and her inhabitants having been declared to be in a state of insurrection in pursuance of a law passed by the two Houses of Congress, your committee deem it improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana till by some joint action of both Houses there shall be some recognition of an existing State government acting in harmony with the Government of the United States and recognizing its authority.

Your committee therefore recommend for adoption, before taking definite action upon the right of the claimants to seats, the accompanying joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Louisiana inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1864, at the city of New Orleans, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to the guarantee and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

CREDENTIALS OF MR. HAHN.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1865.

Mr. Doolittle presented a certified copy of the proceedings of the legislature of the State of Louisiana, showing that the Hon. Michael Hahn was elected a Senator by the legislature of that State for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1865; which were read.

Objection being made by Mr. Davis to the reception of the paper,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

[The debate is found on page 1278 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 38th Cong.]

[Special session of Senate, March, 1865.]

THURSDAY, March 9, 1865.

On motion by Mr. Doolittle, the credentials of the Hon. Michael Hahn, elected a Senator by the legislature of Louisiana, were taken from the files and presented to the Senate.

On motion by Mr. Doolittle,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to the next session of Congress.

[Second session Thirty-eighth Congress, and special session of Senate, March, 1865.]

JOSEPH SEGAR AND JOHN C. UNDERWOOD, of Virginia.

February 17, 1865, the credentials of Mr. Segar, elected to fill the unexpired term ending March 3, 1869, of Lemuel J. Bowden, who died January 2, 1864, were presented. A motion was made that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. After debate it was ordered that they lie on the table. It appears from the debate that the question raised was whether the body electing Mr. Segar was the legislature of Virginia, a great part of that State being in rebellion. Extracts from remarks given below show the grounds upon which certain Senators proceeded.

March 9, 1865, the credentials of Mr. Underwood, elected for the term beginning March 4, 1865, were presented. The credentials of Mr. Segar were taken from the files and presented to the Senate. It was ordered that the further consideration of the credentials of both be postponed to the next session of Congress. Mr. Segar and Mr. Underwood were elected at the same time and by the same legislature. No further action was taken on the credentials.

February 18, 1879, a resolution passed the Senate that there be paid to Mr. Segar out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for his expenses in prosecuting his claim. Petitions for like compensation were filed by the representatives of Mr. Underwood, deceased. Favorable reports were made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1882 and 1884. April 21, 1886, a resolution was passed allowing Mr. Underwood's representatives $5,000 in full compensation of all time and expenses, to be paid out of the contingent fund.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 2d sess. 38th Cong., and extracts from remarks of several Senators. A transcript of the proceedings of the Senate in regard to the allowance of compensation, from Senate Journals, 43d-49th Cong., with the reports thereon, are also given.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1865.

Mr. Willey presented the credentials of the Hon. Joseph Segar, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Virginia to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden; which were read.

A motion was made by Mr. Sumner that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. Howard to amend the motion of Mr. Sumner by adding thereto the words "and that the committee be instructed to inquire and report upon the election, returns, and qualifications of the claimant,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Sherman that the credentials lie on the table,

Mr. McDougall raised a question of order, to wit: That the subject under consideration being a question of privilege, affecting the organization of the Senate, the motion to lie on the table, which precluded debate, was not in order.

The President pro tempore decided that a question of privilege, when brought before the Senate for its action, was subject, like other questions, to such motion as any Senator may think proper to submit; and decided that the motion of Mr. Sherman was in order.

From this decision Mr. McDougall appealed; and the question being submitted to the Senate, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? it was determined in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained; and,

On the question to agree to the motion that the credentials lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 13.

On motion by Mr. McDougall, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Dixon, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright.

So it was Ordered, That the credentials lie on the table.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1865.]

THURSDAY, March 9, 1865.

Mr. Doolittle presented the credentials of the Hon. John C. Underwood, elected a Senator by the legislature of Virginia for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1865; which were read.

On motion by Mr. Sumner,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the credentials be postponed to the next session of Congress.

On motion by Mr. Willey, the credentials of the Hon. Joseph Segar, elected a Senator by the legislature of Virginia, were taken from the files and presented to the Senate; and,

On motion by Mr. Willey,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to the next session of Congress.

"I regret that a question of this magnitude has been precipitated upon the Senate at this late period of the session when there is so much public business which has not yet received the attention of either House of Congress. The Senator from Michigan does not exaggerate its magnitude. Sir, it is much to be a Senator of the United States, with all the powers and privileges pertaining to that office—powers and privileges, legislative, diplomatic, and executive; and the question now is whether all these extraordinary powers and privileges shall be recognized in a gentleman whose certificate has been sent to the Chair. I thought it my duty, on hearing that certificate read as I entered the Chamber, to move at once its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am astonished that there can be any hesitation in making that reference. Sir, Senators who hesitate show an insensibility to the character of the question. Is the Senate ready to act blindfolded or with the eyes open? I insist that on a question of this magnitude the Senate shall act with the eyes open, wide open; and I know no other way in which they can be brought to act so except through the intervention of a responsible committee of this body. Therefore, sir, I proposed that the credentials should be referred to that committee. It will be the duty of the committee, as my friend from Michigan has suggested, to consider in the first place whether a State in armed rebellion like Virginia can have Senators on this floor. That is a great question, constitutional, political, practical. It will be their duty, then, to consider in the next place whether the gentleman whose credentials have been presented has been chosen legally under the Constitution of the United States by any State. Now, sir, I do not intend to prejudge either of these questions. I simply open them now for the consideration of the Senate.

"I say, sir, I do not mean to prejudge these questions; but I do insist that a measure of this importance shall not be acted on without due consideration, and in absolute indifference to those facts which now stare us in the face, glaring upon us every day in every newspaper that we read. Sir, you cannot be insensible to facts. It is in vain that Senators say that Virginia, now in war against the Union, is entitled to representation on this floor, when you have before you the inexorable fact that the greater part of that State is at this moment in possession of an armed rebellion, and when you have before you the other fact filling almost all the newspapers of the land that the body of men who have undertaken to send a Senator to Congress are little more than the common council of Alexandria; and you have the question distinctly presented to you whether a representative of the common council of Alexandria is to enter this Chamber and share the same powers and privileges of my honorable friend near me, the Senator from New York [Mr. Morgan], or my friend farther from me, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Cowan]. I merely open these points without now undertaking to decide them, but simply as an unanswerable argument in favor of the reference to the committee."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Willey, of West Virginia, in favor of allowing Mr. Segar to be at once admitted to his seat. Delivered February 17, 1865, and taken from page 848 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 38th Cong.]

"But the honorable Senator and those who think with him have taken the ground that Virginia is not entitled to representation on this floor. Why, sir, has not the Senate recognized the fact that she is entitled to such representation during the whole of the session and during the whole of the last session of Congress? Has there not been a Senator representing the State of Virginia on this floor, participating in the proceedings of this body, recording his yeas and nays, and to the extent of his vote controlling the legislation of Congress? Has he not been recognized without a murmur and without a word of objection? So far as that fact is concerned I hold that the Senate is barred by its own action, that it should have excluded the honorable gentleman who represents Virginia on the floor already if Virginia be not entitled as a State to representation on this floor. I put it to Senators to say, if Mr. Bowden had been living to-day, whether he would not have been allowed to occupy his seat without let or hindrance, without any objection, the same as his honorable colleague has been allowed to occupy his seat without objection. I say, therefore, the action of the Senate itself has recognized the fact not only that Virginia is entitled to representation on this floor, but that she has been and is represented on this floor; and so long as the honorable Senator who represents Virginia here is allowed to retain his seat it strikes me that it is not competent for the Senate to say that Virginia is not entitled to representation on this floor.

"I fully concur in all that has been said in regard to the importance of this question. I know very well, for I have been enabled to see it and to feel it personally, with what eager desire the loyal population of Virginia are looking to the action of Congress in this respect to sustain the legislature at Alexandria. I know how all the northwest portion of Virginia, now composing the State of West Virginia, was brought in around the loyal legislature of Wheeling, forming a nucleus, until the whole State was brought under the flag of the Union and under the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitution; and I know that such will be the result in Virginia if its loyal legislature is sustained. County after county—such is my information from beyond the lines to-day, having letters in abundance to that effect—eagerly desire for the time to come when they shall be relieved of the power of the rebellion, that they may reorganize the old government of Virginia around the legislature of Alexandria.

"But, sir, it is a fact, not only that the Senate of the United States has recognized the existence of Virginia as a State, and her right to be represented on this floor, but the executive branch of the Government has done so, I imagine; for I saw it stated in the papers the other day that the Secretary of State had transmitted the constitutional amendment for the abolition of slavery to the executive of Virginia, and through him it was sent to the legislature to be acted upon, and that legislature had acted upon it and ratified the amendment. We shall place ourselves in a singular position if we reject a gentleman who comes here accredited with a certificate of election in due form and repulse him from our doors and refuse to allow him a seat on the floor when we have another member representing the same State upon the floor and when the executive branch of the Government recognizes the Virginia legislature at Alexandria as the true legislature, and Governor Peirpoint as the true and legitimate governor of Virginia. I trust that this matter will not be referred at all, but that we will hold out the inducement to the loyal people of Virginia to rally around the loyal legislature at Alexandria."

[Remarks of Mr Sherman, of Ohio, accompanying his motion that the credentials of Mr. Segar be laid on the table. Delivered February 17, 1865, and taken from pages 848, 849 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 38th Cong.]

"I wish to submit to the Senate one or two considerations on this subject, and I shall close my remarks by submitting a motion that is not debatable.

"The credentials presented to us purport to show that this gentleman was elected a member of this body on the 8th day of December last, and they bear date on the 12th day of December last. They have been held by him for more than sixty days. Every intelligent man must have known that the presentation of these credentials would give rise to debate, would involve grave political questions about which there are radical differences of opinion in this body and throughout the country. The condition of the State of Virginia, the condition of the rebel States, the effect of the rebellion, all these matters are involved in the question now presented to the Senate. This gentleman holding these papers might at any moment have presented them as a privileged question, and have stopped all the businesss of this body until they were disposed of, either referred or acted upon. Now, I ask the Senator whether it is reasonable for us at this period of the session to stop our deliberations, when all the important bills of the session remain unacted upon, for the purpose of considering this question? When this gentleman has had these papers in his possession for more than sixty days, when he had the right at any day to present them and call on us to decide the question raised by them, is it reasonable, I ask, to present them at this period of the session, and ask us to postpone all the important business of the session for the purpose of considering them? It seems to me it is not; and, therefore, without going into the merits of the proposition, which is a very grave and difficult one, upon which I myself have not made up my opinion, although I have read and thought a great deal about it, I submit whether, under the circumstances, the best disposition is not to leave the question to be settled by the next Congress.

"The State of Virginia is now represented by one Senator in this body. The State of West Virginia is ably represented by two Senators. The Senator-elect, or the person who claims to act as the Senator-elect from Virginia, has slept upon his rights for sixty, ay, seventy days. It seems to me, therefore, that for the short period of the term for which he was elected, only fifteen days, it is scarcely worth while for us to delay the ordinary business of the country and stop and deliberate upon his right to a seat which at any rate will expire on the 4th day of March next. The question when presented to the next Congress will be one that we shall have ample time to decide. It will be presented at the threshold on the 4th of March next. No doubt then a gentleman claiming to be a Senator from the State of Virginia will present his credentials. Then we can take up the matter and determine it. We can take time, we can deliberate, we can get full information on the subject; and we can dispose of these grave political questions without interfering with the public business. Now we cannot. Under the circumstances, therefore, I feel it my duty to submit a motion that the credentials do lie upon the table."

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, maintaining that the case of Virginia stood on different grounds from that of Arkansas, in regard to which the Committee on the Judiciary had recommended a postponement of the question until the next session of Congress. Delivered March 9, 1865, and taken from the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 38th Cong.]

"In relation to the State of Virginia I think every Senator can easily see that it stands on very different ground perhaps from any of the other States from which Senators have appeared with their credentials. The State of Virginia, as such, has been recognized by this Government in every form, by the executive department, and by Congress. By legislative action we have recognized the government of Virginia as the legitimate government of that State, for it was by the consent of the legislature of that State that we acted when we agreed to a division of the State of Virginia into West Virginia and East Virginia. Whether the action of Congress was wise or unwise in consenting to the erection of the State of West Virginia is not a question which is now to be discussed. The Government has in every form recognized that State. We had until the 4th day of March a Senator from that State, after the division of the State of Virginia. When West Virginia was represented by two Senators on this floor we had two Senators still from old Virginia, one of whom died during the recess of Congress, Hon. Mr. Bowden, and the other of whom remained until the 4th day of March last. So that by the action of this body we have recognized the existence of the State of Virginia—I mean the old State of Virginia independent of the State of West Virginia.

* * * * * * *

"I will finish in a word all that I desire to say. The Presidential proclamation declaring the population of certain States to be in insurrection excepted from its operation the counties of Alexandria city and county, Berkeley, Accomac, Northampton, Princess Anne, Norfolk, Norfolk city, Portsmouth city, and Elizabeth city and county, in the State of Virginia, containing a population of over 175,000; and these counties are now represented in the legislature at Alexandria.

"But, Mr. President, I see that the Senate do not desire to take up and dispose of any of these questions in relation to the admission of Senators from any of these States at the present session; and my purpose in rising now is not to press any such action on the Senate, but simply to state in answer to what fell from some Senators that this case of the State of Virginia may in some respects stand on a different footing in relation to the proclamation declaring States in insurrection, from the other States, because of the action of Congress already in recognizing the government which is denominated the Peirpoint government as being the true government of the State of Virginia, with which we have dealt, upon whose action we have suffered the erection of a new State within the limits of Virginia, so that we may be already committed on that subject in a different form from what we are in relation to these other States. I agree with the Senator from Missouri in relation to all of them, that it is our duty at the earliest practicable moment to take these free States by the hand and give them the moral support of our recognition."

COMPENSATION OF MR. SEGAR.

[First session of the Forty-third Congress.]

MONDAY, December 8, 1873.

Mr. Lewis presented the petition of Joseph Segar, praying to be allowed pay as a Senator from Virginia in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

THURSDAY, February 5, 1874.

Mr. Lewis presented the petition of Joseph Segar, praying compensation as a Senator from Virginia in 1863 and 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[The debate is found on page 1213 of the Congressional Record, vol. ii, part 2.]

[First session of the Forty-fourth Congress.]

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1876.

Mr. Withers presented the petition of Joseph Segar, praying to be allowed pay as a Senator from Virginia in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MONDAY, February 21, 1876.

On motion by Mr. Wright,

Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph Segar, and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[Second session of the Forty-fourth Congress.]

SATURDAY, March 3, 1877.

Mr. Wadleigh submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joseph Segar compensation and mileage as a Senator of the United States from the date of the death of Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden to the end of the term for which said Segar was elected."

[The debate* is found on pages 2195, 2196 of the Congressional Record, vol. v, part 3.]

[Second session of the Forty-fifth Congress.]

WEDNESDAY, December 12, 1877.

On motion by Mr. Withers,

Ordered, That the papers of Joseph Segar, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

THURSDAY, June 13, 1878.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Segar, submitted a report (No. 509) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution. (Resolution given at end of report.)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.†

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Wadleigh (chairman), Mitchell, Cameron of Wisconsin, McMillan, Hoar, Ingalls, Saulsbury, Merrimon, and Hill.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JUNE 13, 1878.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Segar, asking for payment of his salary and mileage as Senator from December 8, A. D. 1864, to March 4, 1869, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

If the petitioner had been admitted to the seat which he claimed, his salary and mileage would have amounted to more than $21,000. He was not admitted, and having never performed the duties of a Senator, under the most recent precedent he is not entitled to compensation and mileage as such. By the same precedent, if he prosecuted in good faith and on reasonable grounds a claim for such seat, he should be allowed a moderate compensation for the expenses incurred by him in such prosecution.

On the 23d of February, 1863, Mr. Bowden was elected Senator for Virginia by the legislature assembled at Wheeling, the great portion of Virginia, including Richmond, its former seat of government, being then in rebellion. He was admitted to his seat, the Senate thereby recognizing the legal existence of the State he represented. West Virginia was then erected into a separate State. The legislature of Virginia assembled at Alexandria and continued the functions of a State legislature of Virginia. Mr. Bowden continued to represent Virginia in the Senate until his death, on the 2d of January, 1864. December 8, 1864, the petitioner was elected to succeed Mr. Bowden, and prosecuted his claim with diligence. The Alexandria government was recognized as a valid State organization by President Lincoln in his amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863. It gave its constitutional assent to the adoption of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and its assent is treated by Mr. Seward in his proclamation announcing the adoption of the amendment as necessary thereto.

Under these circumstances, the petitioner was well warranted in presenting his claim to a seat in the Senate. If the practice then prevailing were now acted upon he would receive full salary and mileage. The Senate in the cases of Ray and McMillan, at the present session, preferred to allow to such claimants only a compensation for reasonable and moderate expenses. As this is a new rule, it would be clearly unjust to require of claimants to furnish minute items and vouchers. We think the sum of $5,000 a reasonable and moderate allowance to Mr. Segar for three years' prosecution of his claim. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Joseph Segar the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for his expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia.

[Third session of the Forty-fifth Congress.]

TUESDAY, February 18, 1879.

On motion by Mr. Hoar, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Joseph Segar the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for his expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia;"

And no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

On the question, Shall the resolution be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 24.

On motion by Mr. Sargent, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Barnum, Blaine, Burnside, Butler, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Conover, Davis of West Virginia, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Garland, Gordon, Grover, Hill, Hoar, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kirkwood, McMillan, Matthews, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morgan, Paddock, Saunders, Sharon, Teller, Voorhees, Wadleigh, Windom, and Withers.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bailey, Bayard, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cockrell, Coke, Conkling, Davis of Illinois, Eaton, Harris, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, McPherson, Maxey, Morrill, Randolph, Ransom, Rollins, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Wallace, and Whyte.

So it was Ordered, That the resolution be engrossed and read a third time.

And the said resolution was read the third time.

Resolved, That it pass.

[The debate is found on pages 1513–1515 of the Congressional Record, vol. viii, part 2.]

CLAIM OF REPRESENTATIVES OF MR. UNDERWOOD, DECEASED.

[Third session of the Forty-fifth Congress.]

SATURDAY, February 22, 1879.

Mr. Withers presented the petition of Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of the estate of John C. Underwood, deceased, praying an appropriation to pay the alleged expenses incident to his election as a Senator in Congress from the State of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[First session of the Forty-seventh Congress.]

TUESDAY, January 24, 1882.

Mr. Walker presented the petition of Maria G. Underwood, praying an allowance to her as the administratrix of J. C. Underwood, deceased, on account of the election of the said J. C. Underwood to the United States Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MONDAY, May 29, 1882.

Mr. Lapham, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Maria G. Underwood, submitted a report (No. 656) thereon accompanied by the following resolution; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent. [Resolution given at end of report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Hoar (chairman), Cameron of Wisconsin, Sherman, Frye, Lapham, Saulsbury, Hill of Georgia, Vance, and Pugh.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MAY 29, 1882.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Lapham, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, asking payment for salary and mileage of the said John C. Underwood from the 4th of March, 1865, to the 4th of March, 1871, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

That on the 9th day of December, 1864, the petitioner's intestate was duly elected a Senator from the State of Virginia, for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865; that he received a certificate of such election in the words and figures following:

VIRGINIA, to wit:

The legislature of this State having, on the ninth day of December, 1864, in pursuance of the Constitution for the United States, chosen John C. Underwood, esquire, a Senator from this State for six years from the fourth day of March next, I, Francis H. Peirpoint, being governor of the Commonwealth, do hereby certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Commonwealth this the fourteenth day December, 1864.

[SEAL OF VIRGINIA.] F. H. PEIRPOINT.

By the governor:

W. J. COWING,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

That the said John C. Underwood duly presented his certificate and credentials as aforesaid, on the 9th day of March, 1865, to the Senate of the United States, and made efforts to obtain his seat in the said Senate, traveling from his home in Virginia to the city of Washington from time to time, and incurred a very considerable expenditure of time and money in so doing; that on the same day of the election of said John C. Underwood one Joseph Segar was also duly elected a Senator from said State and presented his credentials to the Senate; that neither the said Segar nor the said Underwood were admitted to take their seats in the Senate; that the said Segar duly presented his memorial to the Senate during the Forty-fifth Congress, at its second session, asking payment for his salary and mileage as Senator from the 9th of December, 1864, to the 4th of March, 1869, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the committee recommended the passage of a resolution in words and figures following:

"Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Joseph Segar the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for his expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia."

Which resolution was adopted by the Senate, and the amount therein named was paid to the said Segar. The report of the committee in Segar's case contained the following statements:

"If the petitioner had been admitted to the seat which he claimed, his salary and mileage would have amounted to more than $21,000. He was not admitted and having never performed the duties of a Senator, under the most recent precedent he is not entitled to compensation and mileage as such. By the same precedent, if he prosecuted in good faith and on reasonable grounds a claim for such seat, he should be allowed a moderate compensation for the expenses incurred by him in such prosecution."

On the 23d day of February, 1863, the legislature of Virginia assembled at Wheeling, in said State, the greater portion of the State, including the city of Richmond, its former seat of government, being then in rebellion, and elected one Bowden a United States Senator from that State. Said Bowden was admitted to his seat, the Senate thereby recognizing the legal existence of the legislature which elected him. West Virginia, including the city of Wheeling, was then erected into a separate State. The legislature of Virginia, after such formation of a new State, assembled at the city of Alexandria and continued the functions of a State legislature of Virginia. Said Bowden died on the 2d of January, 1864, and said Segar was elected to succeed him at the same time of the election of John C. Underwood, as aforesaid.

The committee in Segar's case further reported as follows:

"The Alexandria government was recognized as a valid State organization by President Lincoln in his amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863. It gave its constitutional assent to the adoption of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and its assent is treated by Mr. Seward in his proclamation announcing the adoption of the amendment as necessary thereto.

"Under these circumstances, the petitioner was well warranted in presenting his claim to a seat in the Senate. If the practice then prevailing were now acted upon he would receive full salary and mileage. The Senate in the cases of Ray and McMillen, at the present session, preferred to allow to such claimants only a compensation for reasonable and moderate expenses. As this is a new rule, it would be clearly unjust to require of claimants to furnish minute items and vouchers. We think the sum of $5,000 a reasonable and moderate allowance to Mr. Segar for three years' prosecution of his claim. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution."

The cases of said Underwood and Segar are alike in all respects, except the terms for which they were chosen. It is true no actual service as Senator was rendered by either, but each stood ready to perform his duties whenever the Senate should allow it; that the said Underwood performed no such service was the fault of the Senate, not his. The precedents fully justify the allowance to said Segar and the allowance asked by the petitioner. The House of Representatives has frequently paid large sums of money to unsuccessful contestants for seats in that body; and the Senate, at the same session during which the allowance was made to Segar, also paid Messrs. Ray and McMillen, and has also paid two claimants for seats from the State of Georgia, although none of them were allowed to occupy their seats in the Senate. The valuable services rendered by said Underwood to the Government in its struggle for national supremacy are matters of history and need not be here repeated. We think the sum allowed and paid to Mr. Segar is a precedent which should be followed in this case, and recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expenses of said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia.

WEDNESDAY, June 7, 1882.

On motion by Mr. Lapham, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution reported by him on the 29th ultimo from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to pay Maria G. Underwood, administratrix, $5,000 in full compensation for expenses of John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate.

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 4616–4618 of the Congressional Record, vol. xiii, part 5.]

[Second session of the Forty-seventh Congress.]

SATURDAY, March 3, 1883.

On motion by Mr. Lapham, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution reported by him May 29, 1882, to pay Maria G. Underwood $5,000 in full compensation for expenses of John G. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

After debate,

Ordered, That the said resolution be postponed indefinitely.

[The debate is found on pages 3697–3706 of the Congressional Record, vol. xiv, part 4.]

[First session of the Forty-eighth Congress.]

MONDAY, December 10, 1883.

On motion by Mr. Hoar,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Maria G. Underwood, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

FRIDAY, June 20, 1884.

Mr. Lapham, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, submitted a report (No. 748) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution for consideration. [Resolution found at end of report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Commonwealth this the 14th day of December, 1864.

[SEAL OF VIRGINIA.] F. H. PEIRPOINT.

By the governor:

W. J. COWING,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

That the said John C. Underwood duly presented his certificate and credentials as aforesaid, on the 9th day of March, 1865, to the Senate of the United States, and made efforts to obtain his seat in the said Senate, traveling from his home in Virginia to the city of Washington from time to time, and incurred a very considerable expenditure of time and money in so doing; that on the same day of the election of said John C. Underwood one Joseph Segar was also duly elected a Senator from said State and presented his credentials to the Senate; that neither the said Segar nor the said Underwood were admitted to take their seats in the Senate; that the said Segar duly presented his memorial to the Senate during the Forty-fifth Congress, at its second session, asking payment for his salary and mileage as Senator from the 9th of December, 1864, to the 4th of March, 1869, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the committee recommended the passage of a resolution in words and figures following:

"Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Joseph Segar the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for his expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia."

Which resolution was adopted by the Senate, and the amount therein named was paid to the said Segar. The report of the committee in Segar's case contained the following statements:

"If the petitioner had been admitted to the seat which he claimed, his salary and mileage would have amounted to more than $21,000. He was not admitted, and having never performed the duties of a Senator, under the most recent precedent he is not entitled to compensation and mileage as such. By the same precedent, if he prosecuted in good faith and on reasonable grounds a claim for such seat, he should be allowed a moderate compensation for the expenses incurred by him in such prosecution."

A majority of the inhabitants of Virginia were opposed to the secession of the State and its union with the confederate government. After the ordinance of secession was adopted, about fifty-five counties in the northwestern portion of the State united in sending delegates to the convention at Wheeling, on the 11th of June, 1861.

* Taken from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 48th Cong., No. 748.

This was done under the advice of the Attorney-General and of President Lincoln, that such counties would be recognized as the lawful government of the State of Virginia if they remained loyal to the Government. The convention thus assembled chose a governor, lieutenant-governor, and council to fill the offices vacated by those who had seceded. John S. Carlile and Waitman T. Willey were chosen United States Senators to occupy the seats vacated by Messrs. Mason and Hunter. They were admitted to their seats in the Senate at the extra session on the 4th of July, 1861. Five members of the House of Representatives were admitted to their seats in that body at the same time, and thus the existence and validity of the government of Virginia were recognized by both Houses of Congress. On the 20th of August, 1861, the convention passed an ordinance to provide for the formation of the State of West Virginia. Delegates from the counties to compose the new State met in convention at Wheeling, framed a constitution for the new State, which was submitted to a vote of the people of said counties in April, 1862, and ratified by an almost unanimous vote.

Governor Peirpoint, the newly installed governor of Virginia, called an extra session of the legislature for the 6th of May, 1862, at which session an act was passed giving the assent of the State of Virginia to the formation of the new State. This consent, with a copy of the proposed constitution, were transmitted to Congress with an application for the admission of West Virginia as a new State. Congress passed an act providing for its admission, which was approved by the President on the 31st of December, 1862, and West Virginia thus became a State in the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The act provided that until the next census the new State should have three members in the House of Representatives. The legislature at Wheeling passed an act authorizing the removal of the seat of government from Wheeling to Alexandria. An election for State officers was held in the fall of 1863. Governor Peirpoint was elected for a full term. Three members of Congress were chosen, and a Senator to take the place of Mr. Willey, who had been elected a Senator from the new State of West Virginia. The Senators and Representatives thus chosen took their seats at the opening of the session of Congress in December, 1863, and continued to hold them until the close of that Congress, on the 4th of March, 1865, except Senator Bowden, who died in the winter of 1865, and Mr. Joseph Segar was chosen to fill his place for the unexpired term.

All the counties represented in the government of Alexandria, as well as those composing the State of West Virginia, were excepted from the proclamation of the President declaring certain States and parts of States in rebellion, and were recognized by the Government as loyal to the United States. The legislature at Alexandria called a convention, which forever abolished slavery in the State of Virginia, and the legislature adopted the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The votes of twenty-seven States were required to make the ratification of the thirteenth amendment valid, and Virginia, under the Alexandria government, made the twenty-seventh.

If Virginia was not a State the thirteenth amendment was never adopted, and slavery has never been legally abolished, nor has West Virginia been constitutionally admitted as a State. In May, 1865, President Johnson issued a proclamation to re-establish the authority of the United States and execute the laws within the limits of the State of Virginia, recognizing Governor Peirpoint as the governor of the State, and directing that he should be aided, so far as might be necessary, in the extension of the State government throughout the limits of the State.

When Congress met in December, 1865, the war had closed, and the State of Virginia, as well the loyal as the disloyal portion, with the other disloyal States, were on some terms to be restored to their relations with the Federal Government. On the first day of the session a resolution was adopted in the House for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses to consider that subject and report by bill or otherwise, and providing that until such report no Senator or Member should be admitted to a seat, and that the credentials of all Senators and Members should be referred to said committee. When the resolution came up in the Senate for action Senator Anthony moved to amend the enacting clause so as to make it a concurrent instead of a joint resolution, and also moved to strike out the following words:

"And until such report shall have been made, and final action by Congress on, no member shall be received into either House from any of the so-called Confederate States, and all papers relating to the representation in said States shall be referred to said committee without debate."

Senator Anthony stated that this portion of the resolution was a violation of the Constitution, which made the Senate the exclusive judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members and also a violation of the practice of the Senate by cutting off debate. Both amendments were adopted by the Senate, and the House concurred in the resolution as amended.

This left Messrs. Segar and Underwood, who had been chosen Senators to represent Virginia from the 4th of March, 1865, free to press their claims to the seats which had been occupied in the Senate since the reorganization of the State government in 1861. It was their duty to the State to press their claims to such seats, and they would have violated their obligations of honor if they had failed to do so.

The joint committee of the two Houses made no report until the month of June, 1866.

The Senators and Representatives from Tennessee who were denied their seats at the opening of the session were admitted to their seats in the month of July, 1866.

The Senators-elect from Virginia had a right to expect the same results, and in good faith pressed their claims for recognition.

The portion of Virginia from which they were elected was expressly excepted from the President's proclamation declaring the inhabitants of certain States to be in rebellion, also in the proclamation of emancipation and in the amnesty proclamation.

In the proclamation of emancipation Virginia was included, except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, and also the counties of Berkeley, Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Anne, and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth. These formed the State of Virginia, after the cession of West Virginia, and had a population entitling the State to three Representatives in the House. They had abolished slavery in 1864, and as to them the proclamation was unnecessary.

The government of Virginia, as organized in 1861, continued its functions, notwithstanding the reconstruction acts, until Governor Peirpoint's term expired in April, 1868. The convention that framed the new constitution in 1867 expressly validated and recognized as binding all the legislative and judicial acts of the State of Virginia during this whole period.

Still later on, in an action brought by the State of Virginia against West Virginia, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the validity of the State government of Virginia and held that its assent in annexing three counties to West Virginia, which were not included in the original cession, was valid and binding upon the State.

Upon these facts and upon the precedents long established, it seems to your committee that Messrs. Segar and Underwood would be entitled to their full salaries as Senators. Mr. Sykes, of Alabama, who had been elected by a legislature pronounced by the Senate as illegal, was allowed his compensation and mileage from March, 1873, to May, 1874, the day he was denied his seat. Mr. Pinchback was allowed pay from March, 1873, when he was elected, to March, 1876, when he was refused a seat, aggregating $16,966.90.

The practice of the Senate, however, in this respect has been modified, and in the cases of Ray and McMillen a compensation for reasonable and moderate expenses only was allowed. Following this rule, the Senate allowed Mr. Segar the sum of $5,000 for his expenses incurred in the prosecution of his claim without an itemized or detailed account of the same.

The fact that Mr. Underwood held and was receiving a salary to another office constitutes no objection to such allowance. Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate have been granted such allowances while at the same time drawing their salaries. Messrs. Kellogg, Ingalls, and Butler were paid their expenses under similar circumstances. If it was the duty of Judge Underwood to make an effort to obtain his seat he should be paid his expenses, although he could not accept the seat when awarded to him without vacating his other office.

The cases of said Underwood and Segar are alike in all respects, except the terms for which they were chosen. It is true no actual service as Senator was rendered by either, but each stood ready to perform his duties whenever the Senate should allow it; that the said Underwood performed no such service was the fault of the Senate, not his. The precedents fully justify the allowance to said Segar and the allowance asked by the petitioner. The House of Representatives has frequently paid large sums of money to unsuccessful contestants for seats in that body; and the Senate, at the same session during which the allowance was made to Segar, also paid Messrs. Ray and McMillen although neither of them were allowed to occupy their seats in the Senate. The valuable services rendered by said Underwood to the Government in its struggle for national supremacy are matters of history and need not here be repeated. We think the sum allowed and paid to Mr. Segar is a precedent which should be followed in this case, and recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expenses of the said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia.

SATURDAY, July 5, 1884.

On motion by Mr. Lapham, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections June 20, 1884, to pay Maria G. Underwood, widow of John C. Underwood, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for expenses of said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate.

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Plumb, the Senate proceeded to consider bill S. 2203, &c.

[Second session of the Forty-eighth Congress.]

FRIDAY, February 20, 1885.

Mr. Lapham submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Alice E. Underwood, executrix of the last will and testament of Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expense of the said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia."

SATURDAY, February 21, 1885.

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Allison in the chair) laid before the Senate the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. Lapham, to pay the executrix of the widow of John C. Underwood his expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate; and the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

THURSDAY, February 26, 1885.

Mr. Jones, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. Lapham on the 20th instant, to pay the heirs of John C. Underwood the amount of his expenses in contesting his right to a seat in the Senate, reported it without amendment.

[Special session of Senate, March, 1885.]

TUESDAY, March 10, 1885.

Mr. Hoar submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

"Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Alice G. Underwood, executrix of the last will and testament of Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expenses of the said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia."

THURSDAY, March 19, 1885.

Mr. Chace, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. Hoar on the 10th instant, to pay the expenses of the late John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate, reported it without amendment.

[First session of the Forty-ninth Congress.]

APRIL 21, 1886.

On motion by Mr. Hoar,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him March 10, 1885, to pay the expenses of John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia; and

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Alice C. Underwood, executrix of the last will and testament of Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expenses of the said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia.

[Thirty-ninth Congress—First session.]

JOHN P. STOCKTON,

Senator from New Jersey from March 4, 1865, till March 27, 1866, and from March 4, 1869, till March 3, 1875.

Mr. Stockton's credentials were presented and he took his seat in the Senate December 4, 1865 At the same time a memorial of members of the legislature protesting against his admission to a seat in the Senate was presented and ordered to lie on the table. January 8, 1866, the credentials and memorial were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. January 30 the committee reported that the facts in regard to Mr. Stockton's election were as follows: There was no law in New Jersey prescribing the "manner" of electing Senators, other than that they "shall be appointed by the senate and general assembly in joint meeting assembled." The joint meeting electing Mr. Stockton passed a resolution that the candidate receiving a plurality of votes of the members present should be declared duly elected. The joint assembly consisted of eighty-one members. All were present when the vote for Senator took place. Mr. Stockton received 40 votes and Mr. Ten Eyck and other persons 41. The question before the Senate was whether a joint convention could prescribe a plurality rule. The committee reported that for the purpose of choosing Senators the joint convention is regarded as the legislature, so that it is vested by the Constitution of the United States with authority to prescribe the manner of electing Senators; and recommended the adoption of a resolution that Mr. Stockton was entitled to his seat. Some Senators maintained that in the absence of any law a majority was by the parliamentary law of the land necessary to constitute a valid election, and that the legislature alone, acting in a legislative capacity through its two branches separately, was competent to prescribe that a plurality should elect. March 23 the resolution reported by the committee passed the Senate, Mr. Stockton voting, by a vote of 22 yeas to 21 nays. March 26 the Senate voted to reconsider the vote agreeing to the resolution. It then resolved "that the vote of Mr. Stockton be not received in determining the question of his seat in the Senate." March 27 the Senate resolved by a vote of 23 yeas to 20 nays that Mr. Stockton was not entitled to his seat.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 1st sess. 39th Cong., and the report of the committee, with the exception of certain accompanying documents, from Senate Reports, 1st sess 39th Cong., No. 4.

Special references to the debates of each day, which are found in the Congressional Globe, part 1 1st sess. 39th Cong., are inserted below.

MONDAY, December 4, 1865.

Mr. Wright presented the credentials of the Hon. John P. Stockton, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of New Jersey for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1865.

The credentials were read and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Stockton, and he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. Cowan presented a memorial of members of the senate and house of representatives of the State of New Jersey protesting against the admission of the Hon. John P. Stockton to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from that State.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

MONDAY, January 8, 1866.

On motion by Mr. Cowan,

Ordered, That the credentials of the Hon. John P. Stockton, United States Senator from the State of New Jersey, together with the memorial of the members of the senate and house of assembly of the State of New Jersey protesting against the admission of the Hon. John P. Stockton to a seat in the United States Senate as a Senator from that State, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1866.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. John P. Stockton, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of New Jersey, and the protest of certain members of the legislature of the said State against the validity of his election, submitted a report (No. 4), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected, and is entitled to his seat, as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865."

Ordered, That the report, with the accompanying credentials and protest, be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Harris, Clark, Johnson, Poland, Stewart, and Hendricks.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 30, 1866.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of John P. Stockton, claiming to have been elected a Senator from the State of New Jersey for six years from the 4th day of March, 1865, together with the protest of certain members of the legislature of said State against the validity of his election, submit the following report:

The only question involved in the decision of Mr. Stockton's right to a seat is whether an election by a plurality of votes of the members of the legislature of New Jersey in joint meeting assembled, in pursuance of a rule adopted by the joint meeting itself, is valid. The protestants insist that it is not, and they deny Mr. Stockton's right to a seat, because, as they say, he was not appointed by a majority of the votes of the joint meeting of the legislature.

The legislative power of the State of New Jersey is vested by the State constitution in a senate and general assembly, which are required, for legislative purposes, to meet separately, but which, for the appointment of various officers, are required to assemble in joint meeting; and when so assembled, are, by the constitution itself, styled the "legislature in joint meeting."

The constitution of New Jersey does not prescribe the manner of choosing United States Senators; as, indeed, it could not, the Constitution of the United States having vested that power, in the absence of any law of Congress, exclusively in the legislature; but it does constitute the two houses one body for the purpose of appointing certain State officers. The statute of New Jersey declares that "United State Senators, on the part of that State, shall be appointed by the senate and general assembly in joint meeting assembled;" but it does not prescribe any rules for the government of the joint meeting, nor declare the manner of election.

The practice in New Jersey has been for the joint meeting to prescribe the rules for its own government.

In 1794 fifteen rules were adopted, the first two of which are as follows:

"1. That the election of State officers during the present session be viva voce, unless when otherwise ordered; and that all officers be put in nomination at least one day before their election.

"2. That the chairman shall not be entitled to vote except in case of a tie, and then to have a casting vote."

The other thirteen rules related chiefly to the method of conducting the proceedings. Each joint meeting which has since assembled has adopted its own rules, usually those of the preceding joint meeting, sometimes, however, with additions or exceptions.

In 1851 the following additional rule was adopted:

"Resolved, That no person shall be elected to any office, at any joint meeting during the present session, unless there be a majority of all the members elected personally present, and agreeing thereto."

In 1855 the joint meeting, after adopting the fifteen rules of the preceding joint meeting, added the following:

"That all candidates for office, upon receiving a majority of the votes cast by this joint meeting, shall be declared duly elected."

The joint meeting of 1861 adopted the rules of the preceding joint meeting for its own government, among which were the following:

"1. That the election of State officers during the present session be viva voce, unless when otherwise ordered.

"15. That in all questions the chairman of the joint meeting be called upon to vote in his turn as one of the representatives in the senate or assembly; but that he have no casting vote as chairman.

"16. That all candidates for office, upon receiving a majority of the votes cast by this joint meeting, shall be declared to be duly elected."

The same rules were adopted by each joint meeting from 1861 to 1865.

The joint meeting which assembled February 15, 1865, and at an adjourned session of which Mr. Stockton was appointed Senator, adopted, at its first meeting, the rules of the preceding joint meeting, except the sixteenth rule, in lieu of which the following was adopted:

"Resolved, That no candidate shall be declared elected unless upon receiving a majority of the votes of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature."

After having appointed various officers under the rules which had been adopted at the assembling of the joint meeting, the following rule was adopted:

"Resolved, That the vote for county judges and commissioners of deeds be taken by acclamation, and that the counties in which vacancies exist be called in alphabetical order."

Acting under this rule, quite a number of officers were appointed by acclamation. Not completing its business the joint meeting adjourned from time to time till March 15, when the following rule was adopted:

"Resolved, That the resolution that no candidate shall be declared elected unless upon receiving a majority of the votes of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature be rescinded, and that any candidate receiving a plurality of votes of the members present shall be declared duly elected."

Every member of both houses, eighty-one in all, was present and voting when the above resolution was passed, and it was carried by a vote of 41 in the affirmative, of whom eleven were senators and thirty representatives, to 40 in the negative, of whom ten were senators and thirty representatives. The joint meeting then proceeded to the election of a United States Senator, with the following result:

Hon. John P. Stockton, 40 votes; Hon. J. C. Ten Eyck, 37 votes; J. W. Wall, 1 vote; P. D. Vroom, 1 vote; F. T. Frelinghuysen, 1 vote; H. S. Little, 1 vote.

Whereupon John P. Stockton, having received a plurality of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected. The joint meeting then proceeded to the election of various other officers, having completed which, it rose.

The credentials of Mr. Stockton are under the great seal of state, signed by the governor and in due form. No objection appears to have been made at the time to the election. Its validity is now called in question by a protest dated March 20, 1865, and signed by eight senators and thirty members of the general assembly. The Constitution of the United States declares that the Senate of the United States "shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof," and that "the times, places, and manner of holding election for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The right to choose United States Senators in a joint meeting of the two houses which compose the legislature of a State has been too long and too frequently exercised to be now brought in question. This has been the manner of election in some States from the beginning, and is now the manner in most of them.

For the purpose of choosing United States Senators the joint meeting of the two houses is regarded as the legislature, and especially would this be so in New Jersey, where the joint meeting is by the constitution of the State denominated a legislature. It has uniformly been held that when the two branches of a legislature meet in joint convention to elect a United States Senator they are merged into one and act as one body, so that an election may be effected against the entire vote of the members of one house if the person voted for receive the requisite number of votes from members of the other. It being, then, settled that the two houses of a legislature in joint meeting assembled constitute the legislature, vested by the Constitution of the United States with authority, acting as one body, to elect a Senator, the question is: Did the joint meeting of the senate and general assembly of New Jersey, duly convened in pursuance of a resolution previously concurred in by each house separately, choose John P. Stockton United States Senator?

That it was competent for a plurality to elect, if a law to that effect had been prescribed by competent authority, will hardly be questioned. This is the rule very generally, if not universally, adopted in the election of members of the House of Representatives, who are "chosen every second year by the people of the several States," and no one questions the validity of the election of a Representative by a plurality vote when the law authorizes a plurality to elect. It is however insisted, and truly, that no law of New Jersey authorizes a plurality to elect. The laws of New Jersey are silent on this subject, but they do authorize a joint meeting of the two houses of the legislature to appoint a Senator, and it has been the uniform practice of this joint meeting since the foundation of the Government to prescribe the rules for its own government. These rules as to the number of votes necessary to effect an election have varied at different times, sometimes requiring a majority of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature, sometimes a majority only of those present, and in the case under consideration only a plurality.

Suppose, under the rule first stated, but seventy-nine members had been present in the joint meeting, and forty had voted for the same person, would he have been elected; and if not, why not? Seventy-nine out of eighty-one would have constituted a quorum, and forty would have been a majority of those present. The only reason why such a vote would not have made an election would be the existence of the rule adopted by the joint meeting, declaring that "no candidate should be elected unless receiving a majority of the votes of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature." While that rule was in force no presiding officer would have thought of declaring a candidate elected, nor would any candidate have supposed himself elected because he received a majority of the votes cast, unless such majority was a majority of all the members elected to the legislature. Under the other rule, "that a person receiving a majority of the votes of those present should be declared elected," who would doubt the validity of an election by 31 out of 60 votes if only so many had been cast? If the joint meeting had the right to prescribe at one time that it should require a majority of all elected to the legislature to elect, at another time that a majority of those present might elect, and at still another time that elections might be had by acclamation, it had the right to prescribe that a plurality should elect; and when any candidate received a plurality he thereupon became elected, not simply by the will of those who voted for him, but by the will of the joint meeting, which had previously, by a majority vote, resolved that such plurality should elect.

It might be urged in this case, with much plausibility, that inasmuch as the constitution of New Jersey recognizes the two houses in joint meeting as a legislature, that such joint meeting was the very body on whom the Constitution of the United States had conferred the power to prescribe "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators;" but your committee prefer placing the authority of the joint meeting to prescribe the plurality rule on the broader ground that in the absence of any law, either of Congress or the State, on the subject, a joint meeting of the two houses of a legislature, duly assembled and vested with authority to elect a United States Senator, has a right to prescribe that a plurality may elect, on the principle that the adoption of such a rule by a majority vote in the first instance makes the act, subsequently done in pursuance of such majority vote, its own.

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865.

THURSDAY, March 22, 1866.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the 30th of January, on the right of the Hon. John P. Stockton to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of New Jersey; which resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865."

On motion by Mr. Clark to amend the resolution in line 1, by inserting after the word "was" the word "not," and after the word "is" the word "not," and,

After debate and the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 1564–1573 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

FRIDAY, March 23, 1866.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on the 30th of January, on the right of the Hon. John P. Stockton to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of New Jersey; which resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865."

After debate, on the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Clark to the resolution, to wit, in line 1 insert after the word "was" the word "not," and after the word "is" the word not," it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Clark, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, and Willey.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Fessenden, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Trumbull, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Yates.

So it was

Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865.

[The debate is found on pages 1589–1602 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

MONDAY, March 26, 1866.

A motion was made by Mr. Sumner that the Journal of Friday, 23d March, 1866, be amended by striking out the vote of Mr. Stockton on the question of his right to a seat in the Senate.

Pending debate thereon, the following message was received, &c.

* * * * * * *

After further debate,

Mr. Sumner asked and obtained leave of the Senate to withdraw his motion; and,

The motion having been withdrawn,

On motion by Mr. Poland that the Senate reconsider its vote on Friday last agreeing to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865,"

It was determined in the affirmative; and

The question recurring upon said resolution,

Mr. Sumner, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the vote of Mr. Stockton be not received in determining the question of his seat in the Senate."

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and

On motion by Mr. Sumner that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report on Thursday next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Johnson, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Yates.

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was

Resolved, That the vote of Mr. Stockton be not received in determining the question of his seat in the Senate.

The question again recurring upon the resolution affirming the right of the Hon. John P. Stockton to his seat in the Senate,

On motion by Mr. Johnson that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to Thursday next,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 1635–1648 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

TUESDAY, March 27, 1866.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, affirming the right of the Hon. John P. Stockton to his seat as a Senator rom the State of New Jersey; and

After debate,

On the question to agree to the motion, yesterday submitted by Mr. Johnson, that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to Thursday next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 23.

On motion by Mr. Johnson, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Yates.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the resolution,

On motion by Mr. Clark to amend the resolution by striking out after the word "Stockton," in line 1, the words "was duly elected, and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865," and in lieu thereof inserting, "is not entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865,"

Mr. Saulsbury raised a question of order, to wit, that the proposed amendment is in effect the same proposition which the Senate had once rejected, and was therefore not in order.

The President pro tempore decided that the proposed amendment, being a proposition different in its terms from that upon which the Senate had voted, was not open to the objection raised, and was in order.

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Davis to amend the amendment proposed by Mr. Clark by striking out all after the word ——— in the first line, and in lieu thereof inserting,

"That the legislature of New Jersey having convened in joint meeting to choose a Senator to the Congress of the United States for six years from the 4th of March, 1865, and said legislature in such joint meeting having passed an order that such election should be made by a plurality vote of that joint meeting; and on the first ballot taken by said meeting, John P. Stockton having received 40 out of the 81 votes of the members of both houses of the legislature constituting such legislature in such joint meeting, and every other person voted for a less number, and the presiding officer of said joint meeting having then announced to it that the said John P. Stockton was elected Senator to Congress, and there being no objection or dissent expressed to said annunciation, the said John P. Stockton was duly elected a Senator from said State, and is entitled to hold his seat as such from the 4th of March, 1865,"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 27.

On motion by Mr. Clark, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

The question recurring on the amendment proposed by Mr. Clark,

On motion by Mr. McDougall that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to Wednesday next at 1 o'clock, it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. McDougall, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

On the question to agree to the amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 21.

On motion by Mr. Clark, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey.

So the amendment was agreed to; and

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. Hendricks, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey.

So it was

Resolved, That John P. Stockton is not entitled to a seat as Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865.

On motion by Mr. Clark that the vote on the passage of the said resolution be reconsidered,

On motion by Mr. Hendricks that the further consideration of the motion to reconsider be postponed to to-morrow at 1 o'clock, it was determined in the negative—yeas 21, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Hendricks, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. Clark, to reconsider the vote on the passage of the resolution, it was determined in the negative—yeas 20, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Clark, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

So the Senate refused to reconsider its vote on the passage of the resolution.

[Thirty-ninth Congress—First session.]

DAVID T. PATTERSON,

Senator from Tennessee from July 28, 1866, to March 3, 1869.

July 26, 1866, the credentials of Mr. Patterson, elected to fill the unexpired portion of the term beginning March 4, 1863, were presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into his qualifications. The following day the committee reported that the only question in relation to his qualifications arose from the fact of his having held the office of circuit judge in the State of Tennessee after that State had passed an ordinance of secession; that his first term of said office having expired after the ordinance of secession was passed, he was induced by Union men to become a candidate for re-election, and was re-elected in May, 1862; that he was himself a "firm, avowed, and influential Union man;" that he allowed himself to become a candidate for re-election "solely upon the motive that he could thereby afford some aid and protection to the Union people;" that the constitution and judicial system of Tennessee remained the same after the secession of the State as before, and that no law was enforced by him as judge except such as were in force before the secession of the State. The committee recommend the adoption of a resolution that Mr. Patterson was duly qualified and entitled to hold the seat. During debate on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee, a joint resolution was introduced in the Senate that Mr. Patterson be admitted upon his taking so much of the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, as is not included in the words, "that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States." This joint resolution passed the Senate, but was laid on the table in the House the same day. The Senate then passed the resolution reported by the committee, it having been amended so as to read, "Resolved, That the Hon. David T. Patterson, upon taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws, be admitted to a seat in the Senate of the United States."

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 1st sess. 39th Cong., and the report of the committee, from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 39th Cong., volume 1, No. 139.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

THURSDAY, July 26, 1866.

Mr. Fowler presented the credentials of the Hon. David T. Patterson, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Tennessee for the unexpired term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1863.

The credentials were read.

On motion by Mr. Sumner that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to inquire into the qualifications of Mr. Patterson,

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 14.

On motion by Mr. Sumner, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Willey.

So it was Ordered, That the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to inquire into the qualifications of Mr. Patterson.

[The debate is found on pages 4162–4169 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

FRIDAY, July 27, 1866.

Mr. Poland, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of the Hon. David T. Patterson, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Tennessee, with instructions to inquire into the qualifications of Mr. Patterson, submitted a report (No. 139) accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. David T. Patterson is duly qualified and entitled to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Tennessee."

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution; and,

On motion by Mr. Clark to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Hon. David T. Patterson, upon taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws, be admitted to a seat in the Senate of the United States,"

It was determined in the affirmative; and,

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

[The debate is found on pages 4213–4216 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

* * * * * * *

Mr. Trumbull asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a joint resolution (S. 144) in relation to the admission of the Hon. David T. Patterson to a seat in the Senate; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That the resolution be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read the third time, by unanimous consent.

On the question, Shall the resolution pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 2.

On motion by Mr. Wade, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Chandler and Wade.

So it was

Resolved, That the resolution pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

[This joint resolution was laid on the table in the House.]

[The debate and joint resolution are found on page 4219 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Poland, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the admission of the Hon. David T. Patterson to a seat in the Senate from the State of Tennessee; and,

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, on the motion of Mr. Clark,

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 11.

On motion by Mr. Sumner, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Sherman, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Chandler, Creswell, Howard, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates.

So it was

Resolved, That the Hon. David T. Patterson, upon taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws, be admitted to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

[The debate is found on pages 4242–4245 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

SATURDAY, July 28, 1866.

The Hon. David T. Patterson, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Tennessee for the unexpired term ending March 3, 1869, appeared, and the oaths prescribed by law being administered by the President pro tempore to Mr. Patterson, he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Harris, Clark, Johnson, Poland, Stewart, and Hendricks.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JULY 27, 1866.—Submitted.

JULY 28, 1866.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Poland submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Hon. David T. Patterson, Senator-elect from the State of Tennessee, with instructions to report whether said Patterson is legally qualified to hold the office of United States Senator from said State, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report as follows:

The only question in relation to the qualifications of Mr. Patterson, or his right to hold his seat in the Senate, arises from the fact of his having held the office of circuit judge in the State of Tennessee after that State had passed an ordinance of secession and become a member of the confederacy.

Circuit judges in Tennessee are elected by the people of the several circuits, and hold their offices for the term of eight years.

Judge Patterson was elected judge in one of the circuits in Eastern Tennessee in May, 1854, and his term of office had not expired when the State passed the ordinance of secession. The constitution of the State of Tennessee remained the same after the secession of the State as before, and there was no change made in the form of the State government, or in their judicial system. A large majority of the people of East Tennessee were ardently devoted to the Union and deemed it very important for their interest and that of the Union cause that the civil offices in that section of the State should be filled with Union men.

Judge Patterson was a firm, avowed, and influential Union man, and he was urgently pressed by the Union men of that circuit to run as a candidate for re-election as circuit judge, and he finally, though reluctantly, consented to do so. The opposing candidate was an avowed secessionist, and the issue in the election was between Union and secession. The election was held in May, 1862, and Judge Patterson was elected over his rebel competitor by a large majority. At the same election most of the local offices in that section were filled by the election of Union men. At that time it was believed by the Union men of East Tennessee that they would soon be relieved from rebel military rule by the arrival of Union forces; and they desired also to retain the civil power in their own hands. In this expectation they were disappointed, and soon rebel bands were scattered through that region, and the Union people were subjected to great hardships and cruel oppression. When Judge Patterson was thus re-elected judge he did not suppose he would be commissioned by the governor of the State, who was a secessionist; but, after some considerable delay, a commission was sent to him with peremptory orders to take the oath. On the receipt of his commission and order to take the oath, Judge Patterson delayed and hesitated, and consulted other leading Union men as to the proper course for him to take. They advised and urged him to take the oath; that he could thereby afford protection to some extent to Union men against acts of lawless violence on the part of the rebels, and that if he did not accept the office and take the oath the office would be filled by a rebel, and they would then be oppressed by the civil as well as the military power of the rebels. Judge Patterson yielded to their urgency and arguments, and went before a magistrate and took the oath which the Tennessee legislature had prescribed, which, in substance, was that he would support the constitution of Tennessee and the constitution of the Confederate States. Judge Patterson declared at the time to the magistrate that he owed no allegiance to the confederate government, and that he did not consider that part of the oath as binding him at all. At this time there were rebel troops in the neighborhood, and Judge Patterson had good reason to believe that his refusal to take the oath would subject him to arrest and imprisonment, if not worse treatment; but we do not find that he was actuated at all by personal considerations, but acted solely upon the motive that he could thereby afford some aid and protection to the Union people, and also prevent the office from falling into hands that would use it to oppress them.

East Tennessee at this time was in a very disturbed and distracted condition. The country was full of bands of armed rebels, and lawless violence held sway. Business was nearly suspended, and no civil business was done in the courts. Judge Patterson held a few terms of court in counties where he could organize grand juries of Union men, and in this way did something toward preserving peace and order in the community. No other business was done by him as judge after his election in 1862.

During all this time Judge Patterson was an open, avowed, and devoted adherent to the Union. He was in constant communication with the officers of the Federal troops nearest that vicinity, and obtained and furnished to them information as to the movements of the rebels. He aided in concealing Union men, and in facilitating their escape to the Union lines, when they generally entered the Union service. He aided the Union people and the Union cause in every way open to him, and too numerous for detail. By these means he became amenable to the hostility of the secessionists, and was subjected to great difficulty and danger. He was several times arrested and held for some time in custody. At times he was obliged to conceal himself for safety, and spent nights in outbuildings and in the woods to avoid their vengeance.

In September, 1863, the Federal troops reached Knoxville, and Judge Patterson succeeded in escaping with his family to that place, and did not return to his home until after the close of the rebellion.

As before stated, the constitution and election laws and judicial system of Tennessee remained the same after the secession of the State as before, and Judge Patterson was elected judge the last time under the same State constitution and laws as existed at his first election, and no laws were enforced by him as judge except such as were in force before the secession of the State.

The committee are all satisfied that during the entire rebellion Judge Patterson was an earnest, firm, and devoted Union man, and suffered severely in support of his principles. In accepting the office of judge, and taking the official oath, he did not intend any hostility to the authority or Government of the United States, nor did he intend to acknowlege any allegiance to, or any friendship for, the confederate government, but acted throughout with a sincere desire to benefit and preserve the Union and the Government of the United States. He always denied the authority of the confederate government over him, and feels an entire willingness and ability to take the oath required upon his admission to a seat in the Senate. The committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. David T. Patterson is duly qualified and entitled to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

[Fortieth Congress—First and second sessions.]

PHILIP F. THOMAS, of Maryland.

March 18, 1867, the credentials of Mr. Thomas, elected for the term beginning March 4, 1867, were presented. The following day the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who were authorized by a resolution of March 20 to send for persons and papers. December 18, the committee submitted the evidence taken, and reported that they found nothing sufficient to debar Mr. Thomas from his seat unless it be found in the fact of his son having entered the service of the confederacy, and in the circumstances connected therewith, in regard to which point the committee express no opinion. A resolution was then submitted that Mr. Thomas be admitted to the seat. February 20, 1868, the Senate resolved that Mr. Thomas "having voluntarily given aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States" was not entitled to take the oath of office or hold the seat. Some Senators maintained that in a case of doubt, where there is absence of evidence showing conclusively that a person had thus voluntarily given aid, &c., the person should be admitted if willing to take the oath of office. Extracts from speeches given below show the conduct of Mr. Thomas which was claimed to be "voluntarily giving aid," &c.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 40th Cong.; the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 40th Cong., 2d sess., No. 5, with the exception of the evidence and documents printed with it; and extracts from speeches from Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 40th Cong., part 1, page 679, and part 2, page 1145.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

MONDAY, March 18, 1867.

Mr. Johnson presented the credentials of the Hon. Philip F. Thomas, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Maryland for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1867; which were read.

On motion by Mr. Howard that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Grimes,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the motion be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 171–180 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 40th Cong.]

TUESDAY, March 19, 1867.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. Howard of yesterday, to refer the credentials of the Hon. Philip Francis Thomas, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Maryland, for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1867, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the motion was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1867.

Mr. Howard submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom have been referred the credentials of Hon. P. F. Thomas, lately chosen a Senator of the United States by the legislature of Maryland, be authorized to send for persons and papers for the purposes of said reference."

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1867.

Mr. Howard presented a letter from the president of the National Bank of Commerce of New York, addressed to him, accompanied by the annual statement to the shareholders of the Bank of Commerce, in New York, May 12, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[A statement by Mr. Howard is found on page 372 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 40th Cong.]

TUESDAY, April 2, 1867.

Mr. Johnson presented a letter addressed to him by the Hon. Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, relating to a report of the Bank of Commerce to their shareholders, dated March 12, 1862, and presented to the Senate on the 27th of March last by the Hon. Mr. Howard; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[The debate is found on pages 821–824 of the Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 40th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1867.

Mr. Johnson, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred on the 20th of March last the credentials of Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, beg leave to report:

That they have taken the evidence submitted herewith, and that they find nothing sufficient, in the opinion of the committee, to debar said Thomas from taking his seat, unless it be found in the fact of the son of said Thomas having entered the military service of the confederacy, and in the circumstances connected with that fact or relating to it, and without the expression of an opinion in regard to this point, they report the whole evidence to the Senate.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull, Stewart, Frelinghuysen, Edmunds, Conkling, Johnson, and Hendricks.]

On motion by Mr. Johnson,

Ordered, That the report and accompanying evidence be printed.

Mr. Johnson submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, be admitted to his seat on his taking the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Ordered, That it lie on the table, and be printed.

MONDAY, January 6, 1868.

On motion by Mr. Johnson, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 18th of December, to admit Philip F. Thomas, a Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, to his seat in the Senate; and,

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 320–330 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

MONDAY, January 20, 1868.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Johnson on the 18th of December, to admit Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, to his seat in the Senate; and,

After debate, and the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 632–635 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

TUESDAY, January 21, 1868.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 653–662 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1868.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 678–686 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1868.

The Senate resumed, &c.

THURSDAY, February 13, 1868.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Johnson on the 18th December last, to admit Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, to his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. Sumner to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, cannot be admitted to take the oath of office required by the Constitution and laws, inasmuch as he allowed his minor son to leave the paternal house to serve as a rebel soldier, and gave him at the time $100 in money, all of which was 'aid,' 'countenance,' or 'encouragement' to the rebellion, which he was forbidden to give; and further, inasmuch as in forbearing to disclose and make known the treason of his son to the President, or other proper authorities, according to the requirement of the statute in such cases, he was guilty of misprision of treason as defined by existing law,"

After debate, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 1144–1156 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

FRIDAY, February 14, 1868.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 1165–1177 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

MONDAY, February 17, 1868.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 1205–1210 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

TUESDAY, February 18, 1868

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 1232–1243 of the Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 40th Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1868.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Johnson, on the 18th of December last, to admit Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from the State of Maryland, to his seat in the Senate; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Sumner to the resolution,

After debate,

Mr. Sumner withdrew his amendment to the said resolution.

On motion by Mr. Conkling to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof:

"That, in the judgment of the Senate, Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, cannot with truth take the oath prescribed by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and that therefore he be not allowed to take said oath,"

After further debate,

Mr. Conkling withdrew his amendment to the said resolution; and

The question then recurred on agreeing to the resolution submitted by Mr. Johnson; and After further debate, it was determined in the negative—yeas 21, nays 28.

On motion by Mr. Drake, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates.

So the resolution was not agreed to; and

Thereupon

Mr. Drake submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Philip F. Thomas, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland, or to hold a seat in this body as such Senator; and that the President pro tempore of the Senate inform the governor of the State of Maryland of the action of the Senate in the premises."

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution; and

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. Drake, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams.

So it was

Resolved, That Philip F. Thomas, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland, or to hold a seat in this body as such Senator; and that the President pro tempore of the Senate inform the governor of the State of Maryland of the action of the Senate in the premises.

"Now, Mr. President, the two facts which are relied upon by those who oppose the admission of Mr. Thomas are these: First, that he resigned his office in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan; and second, that when his son left him to join the rebellion, he gave his son $100 in money. I maintain that both of those facts are susceptible of a double construction. I admit you may give a construction to either of them which would tend to show his guilt, that he sympathized with or countenanced the rebellion; but I maintain, on the other hand, that both of those facts are entirely consistent with his innocence. Take the first fact, the fact of his resignation. It is said that he resigned his position in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan because he did not believe with Mr. Buchanan that he had a right to maintain a military force in the harbor of Charleston. That is what is alleged. Suppose that to be true; does that show that Mr. Thomas was in favor of the rebellion? It shows that Mr. Thomas had a wrong opinion as to the power of this Government. It shows that Mr. Thomas was of opinion that the Government either had not the power or that it would be against good policy for the Government to exert the power by force to hold the harbor of Charleston.

"Do we not know it to be a fact that hundreds and thousands of men from their education were led to believe and did believe that the Government of the United States had not the power by force of arms to hold a State in the Union? The great mass, I may say, of the Southern people were educated in that belief. I have no doubt that a great many persons in the State of Maryland were educated in that belief, and had been for a whole generation. The right of a State to separate from the Union was a doctrine which had been inculcated in all the States of the South, in the universities of the South, in the pulpits of the South, in the press of the South. I may say that a whole generation had been reared under the trainings and teachings of that very doctrine, that a State had a right to withdraw itself from the Union, and that the allegiance which the citizen owed in any State was an allegiance to the State first, and to the Union afterward. I agree that this is a most fatal heresy, a heresy which led to this rebellion, and which bathed the whole land in blood, costing the South two hundred thousand or three hundred thousand of the lives of their ablest and strongest and best, and costing us half a million more. But, sir, it was an opinion entertained by many, and even if Mr. Thomas entertained that opinion I maintain that the holding of that opinion was not of itself treasonable. It did not make him guilty in any respect of the crime of treason, unless he gave his countenance and support to the rebellion.

"What does he say in this letter of resignation? He says that he is not able to concur in the views entertained by President Buchanan 'touching the authority, under existing laws, to enforce the collection of the customs at the port of Charleston.' He states to Mr. Buchanan that he does not agree with him in opinion, and for that reason he proposes to withdraw from the Cabinet. Is there in that fact anything which goes to show that Mr. Thomas was in favor of the rebellion? No, sir. It may show that Mr. Thomas did not believe that we had the power by force of arms then to enforce the collection of the revenues in the harbor of Charleston. You remember that as long ago as 1833 a question arose about enforcing the revenue laws in the harbor of Charleston, and the celebrated force bill was brought forward and passed in 1832 or 1833, I believe. But that law was not standing upon the statute-book in 1860. That law was only temporary, and Mr. Thomas may have been of the opinion that it required new legislation on the part of Congress before you could resort to force to collect the duties in the harbor of Charleston; and because he disagreed with Mr. Buchanan, rather than embarrass him he tendered his resignation and retired from the Cabinet. I insist that this act of Mr. Thomas is susceptible of a construction in accordance with his entire innocence of any connection with the rebellion.

"Then, as to the other fact—the fact that he gave to his son on the morning when he left home $100 in money—I agree that if he gave that money to his son with a view to aid him on his way to the rebellion it would be susceptible of a construction which would make him guilty of aiding the rebellion. But, sir, what are the facts stated? His son states that he had made his arrangements to go, that he had determined to go, that he informed his father that he was then ready to go, and would go. The father told him the ground, and the only ground, upon which he gave him this money. It was not to aid him to go to the rebellion, but that in case he was imprisoned or in suffering he might have a sum of money with him. It was the prompting of his paternal heart, while with tears in his eyes he was protesting against his son going. I submit that this is susceptible of two constructions; and if it be susceptible of two constructions, one of which is consistent with his innocence, we are bound, in the ordinary charity which administers justice among men, to give to it the innocent rather than the guilty construction.

"Mr. President, we may establish here a precedent of the most dangerous character. When the person elected, against whose veracity I believe no one has ever raised a question, whose private character as an individual stands above reproach, comes here and is ready in the presence of this Senate and of Almighty God to put his hands upon the Gospels and take the oath that he never did countenance or aid the rebellion in any way whatever, I say, in the absence of any evidence which goes to show conclusively, against any reasonable doubt, that he is guilty, we are bound to receive him. We tender this oath to him; we make him the witness in the case. In equitable proceedings, if a party chooses to make the other party his witness, he is bound by his testimony. And I say if we choose to put this oath to the applicant and call him here to swear whether he is loyal to the Government of the United States or not, and if he is willing to do it, knowing him as we do, his character as it stands before us being above reproach as an individual, what right have we not to believe the statement which he makes if the facts which appear are susceptible of a construction in accordance with innocence rather than with guilt?"

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, against the right of Mr. Thomas, delivered in the Senate February 13, 1868, and found in the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 40th Cong., page 1145.]

"A great debate on the question how loyalty shall be secured in the rebel States is for the time silenced in order to consider how loyalty shall be secured in this Chamber Everywhere in the rebel States disloyal persons are struggling for power; and now at the door of the Senate we witness a similar struggle. If disloyalty cannot be shut out of this Chamber, how can we hope to overcome it elsewhere?

"More than once at other times I have discussed the question of loyalty in the Senate. But this was anterior to the adoption of the fourteenth constitutional amendment. The case is plainer now than then, inasmuch as there is now an explicit text requiring loyalty as a 'qualification.' Formerly we were left to something in the nature of inference; now the requirement is plain as language can make it. By the new amendment it is provided that 'no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.'

"These words are precisely applicable to the present case. They lay down a rule from which there is no appeal; and this rule is not merely in the statutes, but in the Constitution. It is the plain declaration that loyalty is a requirement in a Senator and Representative. If we do not apply it to ourselves now it is difficult to see with what consistency we can apply it to others. Your course here will affect the meaning of this constitutional amendment, if not its validity for the future.

"I do not stop to argue the question, if that amendment is now a part of the Constitution; for I would not unnecessarily occupy your time, nor direct attention from the case which you are to decide. For the present I content myself with two remarks: first, the amendment has already been adopted by three-fourths of the States that took part in proposing it, and this is enough, for the spirit of the Constitution is thus satisfied; and, secondly, it has already been adopted by 'the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States' which have legislatures, thus complying with the letter of the Constitution. Therefore by the spirit of the Constitution, and also by its letter, this amendment is now a part of the Constitution, binding on all of us. As such I invoke its application to this case. In face of this positive peremptory requirement it is impossible to see how loyalty can be other than a 'qualification.' In denying it you practically set aside this amendment.

"But even without this amendment, I cannot doubt that the original text is sufficiently clear and explicit. It is nowhere said in the Constitution that certain specified requirements and none others shall be 'qualifications' of Senators. The word 'qualifications,' which plays such a part in this case, occurs in another connection, where it is provided that 'each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.' What these 'qualifications' may be is to be found elsewhere. Searching the Constitution from beginning to end we find three 'qualifications,' which come under the head of form, being (1) age, (2) citizenship, and (3) inhabitancy in the State. But behind and above these is another 'qualification,' which is of substance, in contradiction to form only. So supreme is this that it is placed under the safeguard of an oath. This is loyalty. It is easy to see how infinitely more important is this than either of the others—than age, than citizenship, or than inhabitancy in the State. A Senator failing in either of these would be incompetent by the letter of the Constitution; but the Republic might not suffer from his presence. On the other hand, a Senator failing in loyalty is a public enemy, whose presence in this council Chamber would be a certain peril to the Republic.

"It is vain to say that loyalty is not declared to be a 'qualification.' I deny it. Loyalty is made a 'qualification' in the amendment to the Constitution; and then again in the original text, when in the most solemn way possible it is distinguished and guarded by an oath. Men are familiarly said to 'qualify' when they take the oath of office, and thus the language of common life furnishes an authentic interpretation to the Constitution.

"But no man can be allowed to take the oath as Senator when, on the evidence before the Senate, he is not competent. If it appear that he is not of sufficient age, or of the required citizenship or inhabitancy, he cannot be allowed to go to that desk. Especially if it appear that he fails in the all-important 'qualification' of loyalty, he cannot be allowed to go to that desk. A false oath, taken with our knowledge, would compromise the Senate. We who consent will become parties to the falsehood. We shall be parties in the offense. It is futile to say that the oath is one of purgation only, and that it is for him who takes it to determine on his conscience if he can take it. The Senate cannot forget the evidence; nor can its responsibility in the case be swallowed up in any process of individual purgation. On the evidence we must act and judge accordingly. The 'open sesame' of this Chamber must be something more than the oath of a suspected applicant.

"According to Lord Coke, 'an infidel cannot be sworn' as a witness. This was an early rule which has since been softened in our courts. But under the Constitution of the United States and existing statutes a 'political infidel cannot be sworn' as a Senator. Whatever may be his inclination or motive he must not be allowed to approach your desk. The country has a right to expect that all who enter here shall have a sure and well-founded loyalty, above all question or 'suspicion.' And such I insist is the rule of the Constitution and of Congress.

"As if to place the question beyond all doubt, Congress by positive enactment requires that every Senator, before admission to his seat, shall swear that he has 'voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility' to the United States. Here is little more than an interpretation of the Constitution. The conclusion is plain. No person who has voluntarily given even 'countenance' or 'encouragement' to another engaged in the rebellion can be allowed to take that oath.

"After this statement of the rule, the question arises, if Philip F. Thomas can be permitted to take the oath at your desk, or, in other words, to 'qualify' as a Senator of the United States. Is he competent? This is a question of evidence.

"The ample discussion of the facts in this case, and their singular plainness, supersede the necessity of all details. The atmosphere about Mr. Thomas and his acts are harmonious. From the beginning we find him enveloped in coldness and indifference while his country was in peril. But, observing him more closely, we are shocked by two acts of positive disloyalty, one of which is the natural prelude of the other. The first muttering of the rebellion found him a member of the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan; but when this uncertain President proposed the succor of our troops at Charleston, already menaced with war, Mr. Thomas withdrew from the patriotic service. He resigned his seat, following the lead of Cobb, Thompson, and Floyd. A man is known by the company he keeps. His company at this time were traitors. And the act they united in doing was essentially disloyal. As the rebellion assumed the front of war they all abandoned their posts—some to join the rebellion and mingle with its armies; Mr. Thomas more prudently to watch the course of events in Maryland, ready to lift his arm also if his State pronounced the word. This concerted desertion was in itself a conspiracy against the Government; and, in the case of Mr. Thomas, who was Secretary of the Treasury, it was a blow at the national credit, which it was his special duty to guard. It was an act of disloyalty to be blasted by indignant history, even if your judgment fails now. And this was the first stage in this record.

"Meanwhile the war rages. Armies are marshaled. Battles ensue. Washington itself is beleaguered. The Republic trembles with peril. But Mr. Thomas continues in the seclusion of his home, enveloped in the same disloyal atmosphere, and refusing always the oath of allegiance. At last in 1863 an only son arrives at the age of eighteen. Though still a minor he is already of the military age. Naturally filled with the sentiments of his father's fireside, he seeks to maintain them by military service. He is like his father, but with the ardor of youth instead of the caution of years. He avows his purpose to enlist in the rebel army, thus to levy war against his country and adhere to its enemies. All this was treason—plain, palpable, unquestionable, downright treason. Instead of detaining his son; instead of keeping him back; instead of interposing a paternal veto; instead of laying hands gently upon him; instead of denouncing him to the magistrate, all of which the father might have done, he deliberately lets him go, and then, to cap the climax of criminal complicity, furnishes the means for his journey and his equipment. He gives $100. The father is not rich, and yet he gives this considerable sum. Few soldiers started with such ample allowance. Thus it stands. The father, who has already deserted his post in the Cabinet and has refused to take the oath of allegiance to his country, contributes a soldier to the rebellion, and that soldier is his only son. To complete and assure the great contribution, he contributes a sum of money also. If all this accumulated disloyalty, beginning in a total renunciation of every patriotic duty, and finally consummated by an act of flagrant, unblushing enormity, is not 'aid and comfort' or 'countenance' or 'encouragement' to the rebellion, it is difficult to say what can be. There must be new dictionaries for these familiar words, and they must receive a definition down to this day unknown. They must be treated as thread or gossamer, when they should be links of iron.

[Fortieth Congress—Second session.]

JOHN T. JONES AND AUGUSTUS H. GARLAND VS. ALEXANDER McDONALD AND BENJAMIN F. RICE, of Arkansas.

Arkansas had been without representation in Congress from 1861. June 23, 1868, the credentials of Mr. McDonald and Mr. Rice, elected April 15, 1868, to fill the unexpired terms ending March 3, 1871 and 1873, were presented. On the same day there were presented from the files of the Senate credentials of Mr. Jones and Mr. Garland, purporting to be certificates of their elections for the same terms. The two latter credentials had been originally presented to the Senate and ordered to lie on the table in the years 1866 and 1867, soon after the respective elections. They were again ordered to lie on the table. It appears from the debate that the elections of Messrs. Jones and Garland took place when a provisional government existed in Arkansas. A motion was then made that the credentials of Messrs. McDonald and Rice be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion was determined in the negative, and Messrs. McDonald and Rice took their seats. It appears from the debate on their credentials that some Senators were of opinion that the credentials should be referred to a committee for the reasons that they did not in some particulars conform to the act of July 25, 1866, regulating the election of Senators, and that the election had taken place before the passage of the act declaring Arkansas entitled to representation in Congress.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 40th Cong., 2d sess.

The debate is found on pages 3384–3389 of the Congressional Globe, part 4, 2d sess. 40th Cong.

TUESDAY, June 23, 1868.

Mr. Thayer presented the credentials of Benjamin F. Rice, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Arkansas for the unexpired term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1867; which were read.

Mr. Thayer presented the credentials of Alexander McDonald, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Arkansas for the unexpired term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; which were read.

Mr. Davis presented from the files of the Senate papers purporting to be the credentials of John T. Jones and Augustus H. Garland, chosen Senators by the legislature of the State of Arkansas for the unexpired terms commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865, and on the 4th day of March, 1867.

Mr. Howard submitted a motion that the papers presented by Mr. Davis lie on the table.

Mr. Hendricks asked to have the papers read; and Objection being made thereto,

The President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate, to wit: Shall the papers be read? and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 16.

On motion by Mr. Hendricks, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, and Wilson.

So it was decided that the papers be read; and

The Secretary having read the same, the question recurred on the motion of Mr. Howard that the papers presented by Mr. Davis lie on the table; and

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative.

A motion was then submitted by Mr. Davis that the credentials of Benjamin F. Rice and the credentials of Alexander McDonald be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative; and

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Rice and Mr. McDonald by the President pro tempore, and they took their seats in the Senate.

[Fortieth Congress—Second session.]

WILLIAM MARVIN vs. THOMAS W. OSBORN, of Florida.

Florida had been without representation in Congress from 1861. June 30, 1868, the credentials of Mr. Osborn, elected to fill the unexpired term ending March 3, 1873, were presented. They were signed by Harrison Reed, governor, and certified that he had been elected June 18, 1868. A motion was made that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It appears from the debate that by a resolution of the Florida legislature the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments had been "adopted." It was maintained by some that this was not a sufficient "ratification" of the amendments. Pending debate on the motion to refer Mr. Osborn's credentials, the credentials of Mr. Marvin, claiming to have been elected for the same term, were presented. They were signed by David S. Walker as governor, and certified that Mr. Marvin had been elected November 28, 1866. The motion to refer Mr. Osborn's credentials to a committee was determined in the negative, and Mr. Osborn was admitted to the seat. No further action was taken on Mr. Marvin's credentials. It appears from the debate on them that Mr. Marvin had been elected before Congress had declared that Florida was entitled to representation in Congress, it having declared that Florida was not entitled to appoint electors for President and Vice-President.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from the Senate Journal, 40th Cong., 2d sess.

The debates are found on pages 3598–3607 of the Congressional Globe, part 4, 2d sess. 40th Cong.

TUESDAY, June 30, 1868.

Mr. Howe presented a resolution of the legislature of the State of Florida ratifying the amendments to the Constitution of the United States known as Articles XIII and XIV; which was read.

Mr. Howe presented the credentials of Thomas Ward Osborn, elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Florida for the unexpired term commencing March 4, 1867; which were read.

A motion was made by Mr. Drake that the resolution of ratification of the legislature of Florida and the credentials of Mr. Osborn be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After debate,

Mr. Doolittle presented a paper purporting to be the credentials of William Marvin, elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Florida on the 28th of November, 1866, for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1867, and asked that the paper be read.

Objection to the reading of the paper having been made by Mr. Howe,

The President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate, Shall the paper be read? and it was determined in the affirmative; and

The said paper having been read, the question recurred on the motion of Mr. Drake to refer the resolution of the legislature of Florida and the credentials of Mr. Osborn to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 30.

On motion by Mr. Conness, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Vickers.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

So the motion of Mr. Drake was not agreed to.

Mr. Howe submitted a motion that the oaths prescribed by law be now administered to Mr. Osborn.

A motion was made by Mr. Drake that the credentials of Mr. Osborn lie on the table, and that the resolution of the legislature of Florida ratifying the amendments to the Constitution of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. Conness raised the question of order, to wit, that the motion to administer the oaths of office to Mr. Osborn having been first made, and being in the nature of a privileged question, had precedence over the motion of Mr. Drake.

The President pro tempore sustained the question of order raised by Mr. Conness, and decided the motion of Mr. Drake not in order; and

On the question, Shall the oaths prescribed by law be now administered to Mr. Osborn?

On motion by Mr. Drake that the further consideration of said question be postponed to to-morrow, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 31.

On motion by Mr. Conness, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Hendricks, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, and Vickers.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

So the motion to postpone the further consideration of the question to administer the oaths to Mr. Osborn was not agreed to; and

On the question, Shall the oaths prescribed by law be now administered to Mr. Osborn? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 6.

On motion by Mr. Drake, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Johnson, McCreery, and Vickers.

So the motion was agreed to; and

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Osborn by the President pro tempore, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[Third session, Fortieth Congress, and Forty-first Congress.]

JOSHUA HILL AND H. V. M. MILLER.

WHITELEY AND FARROW VS. HILL AND MILLER,

Of Georgia.

December 7, 1868, the credentials of Joshua Hill, elected for the unexpired portion of the term beginning March 4, 1867, were presented. December 10, his credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. January 11, 1869, the credentials of H. V. M. Miller, elected for the unexpired portion of the term beginning March 4, 1865, were presented and referred to the same committee. January 25, 1869, the committee reported on the credentials of Mr. Hill. The chief question to be decided was whether Georgia had complied with the conditions of an act providing for her admission to representation. This act provided that "no person prohibited from holding office under the United States or any State by section 3 of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article 14, shall be deemed eligible to any office in said State unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment." The committee reported that some of the members composing the legislature electing Mr. Hill were disqualified under the above provision; that the legislature had gone through with the forms of an investigation which did "not appear to have been conducted in good faith," and had found none of the members disqualified; that "the election and qualification of members of the legislature, where the existence of any legislature authorized to act as such is not involved, cannot be inquired into by the Senate in determining the right of a Senator to his seat;" but that "the question involved in this case is not whether persons not entitled to seats in the legislature were received by that body and allowed to vote upon the election of a Senator, but whether the body assuming to be the legislature violated the conditions upon which it was allowed to organize by permitting disloyal persons to participate in its proceedings." The committee submitted a resolution that Mr. Hill "ought not now to be admitted" to take his seat. There was a minority report. February 17, 1869, the committee reported against admitting Mr. Miller to his seat. There was no written report. In the next session of Congress the credentials of Messrs. Hill and Miller were again referred to the committee, who reported them back, and they were laid on the table. February 14, 1870, in the next session, the credentials were again referred to the committee. A new election having been held, the credentials of Richard H. Whiteley, elected for the unexpired portion of the term beginning March 4, 1865, and the credentials of Henry P. Farrow, elected for the unexpired portion of the term beginning March 4, 1867, were presented July 15, 1870, and ordered to lie on the table. No reports were made during this session on the credentials; but an act was passed (approved December 22, 1869) to promote the reconstruction of Georgia; a report was made March 2, 1870 (No. 58), on the question whether the legislature had been reorganized in accordance with the provisions of this act; and an act was passed (approved July 15, 1870) declaring that the State was entitled to representation in Congress. The proceedings of the Senate relating to these acts are not included in the proceedings given below. December 3, 1870, in the next session of Congress, the credentials of Messrs. Whiteley and Farrow were referred to the committee. January 23, 1871, the committee reported on the credentials of the four claimants that Messrs. Hill and Miller, elected under the organization of 1868, were duly elected, but that Mr. Miller, having acted as a surgeon in the rebel army, could not take the oath required by the act of July 2, 1862. They recommended the adoption of the resolution that Mr. Hill was entitled to his seat. There was a minority report recommending the adoption of a resolution declaring Messrs. Whiteley and Farrow (who had been elected under the organization of 1870) entitled to seats. February 1, 1871, the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to and Mr. Hill took his seat in the Senate. February 24, 1871, a joint resolution prescribing an oath to be taken by Mr. Miller was approved, and Mr. Miller took his seat.

The proceedings of the Senate relating to this joint resolution are not included in theextr acts given below.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to the case from Senate Journals, 3d sess. 40th Cong., and 1st, 2d, and 3d sess. 41st Cong., with extracts from the reports. A portion of report No. 58, 2d sess. 41st Cong., referred to above, is included in the report made January 23, 1871, given below.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below, and references to the reports are given in foot-notes.

[Third sesson of the Fortieth Congress.]

CREDENTIALS OF MR. HILL.

MONDAY, December 7, 1868.

Mr. Sherman presented the credentials of Joshua Hill, elected a Senator by the general assembly of the State of Georgia for the unexpired portion of the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1867; which were read.

Mr. Drake moved that the said credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary when said committee shall have been appointed.

Pending debate,

Mr. Wilson presented a memorial of the representatives of the colored voters of the State of Georgia, in convention assembled, in relation to the action of the legislature of that State in expelling twenty-nine colored members from the said legislature; which was read; and,

After further debate,

On motion by Mr. Sherman,

Ordered, That the credentials of Mr. Joshua Hill lie on the table.

[The debate is found on pages 1–5 of Congressional Globe, part 1, 3d sess. 40h Cong.]

THURSDAY, December 10, 1868.

On motion by Mr. Sherman,

Ordered, That the credentials of Joshua Hill, a Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, together with the letter of the governor of the State of Georgia in relation to the execution of the laws known as the reconstruction laws, and the memorial of the representatives of the colored voters of Georgia in convention assembled, in relation to the expulsion of certain members from the legislature of that State, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONDAY, January 25, 1869.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Joshua Hill, elected a Senator by the legislature of Georgia for the unexpired portion of the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1867, submitted a report (No. 192), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Joshua Hill, claiming to be Senator-elect from Georgia, ought not now to be permitted to take a seat in this body."

Mr. Trumbull asked and obtained leave of the Senate to present the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the right of Joshua Hill, Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, to a seat in the Senate; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee submitted by Mr. Stewart.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CREDENTIALS OF MR. HILL—MAJORITY AND MINORITY.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Stewart, Frelinghuysen, Edmunds, Conkling, Rice, Carpenter, and Hendricks.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 25, 1869.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Joshua Hill, claiming to be Senator-elect from Georgia, beg leave to submit the following report:

The credentials referred to your committee are in the usual form, and if the State of Georgia is entitled to representation in Congress, Mr. Hill ought to be permitted to take his seat.

From the fact of the reference, your committee feel called upon to go behind the credentials to ascertain if any reasons exist why Mr. Hill should not be admitted to the Senate.

On the 21st of May, 1868, the President transmitted to Congress a proposed constitution for the State of Georgia which had been framed by a convention assembled under the reconstruction acts of Congress and ratified by the people. On the 25th June, following, Congress passed an act which, among other things, provided for the admission of Georgia to representation upon compliance with certain conditions therein named, the most important of which was that the legislature of Georgia should duly ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as the fourteenth amendment. The act further provides that after compliance with the required conditions "the officers of said State duly elected and qualified under the constitution hereof shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States or any State by section 3 of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article 14 shall be deemed eligible to any office in said State unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment."

The obvious design of this provision was to prevent the new organization from falling under the control of enemies of the United States, so as to defeat the reconstruction of the State.

The right of Mr. Hill (if regularly elected) to a seat in the Senate depends upon three important considerations:

First. Did the legislature of Georgia, regularly organized in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, the laws of Congress, and the constitution of Georgia, duly ratify the fourteenth amendment, and comply with the various conditions imposed by the act of June 25, 1868?

Second. Have the legislature and people of Georgia, subsequent to such compliance with said acts of Congress, committed such acts of usurpation and outrage as to place the State in a condition unfit to be represented in Congress?

Third. Whether, on the whole case, taking the action of Georgia both before and since the pretended ratification of the fourteenth amendment, a civil government has been established in that State which Congress ought to recognize?

These questions must be answered by the law and the facts.

* Taken from Senate Reports, 3d sess. 40th Cong., No. 192. The accompanying documents, making pages 5–31 and 38–40 of the report, are omitted.

The district commander, General Meade, by a general order dated June 25, 1868, declared the result of the election; Rufus B. Bullock being elected governor, and among the members elected to the legislature in that order were thirty-one colored men—three senators and twenty-eight representatives. (See Exhibit No. 1.) By a proclamation of the governor-elect, in pursuance of the act of June 25, 1868, the legislature of Georgia convened on the 4th July following. On the 8th July the organization of the two houses was effected, and all persons declared elected were allowed to take their seats.

When the governor-elect was notified of the action of the two houses, he addressed a communication to General Meade, commander of the district, informing him of the fact, and also that it was alleged that a number of the members of the general assembly who had taken their seats, and one or more officers of that body, were not eligible under the act of June 25, 1868, by reason of their having taken an official oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and subsequently had given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. General Meade on the same day replied to the communication, and among other things desired the governor-elect to communicate to the legislature that he could not recognize any act of that body as valid or allow the same to be executed until satisfactory evidence was produced that all persons excluded by the fourteenth amendment were deprived of their seats in both houses. Whereupon the two houses went through the form of an investigation. But from the evidence before your committee the investigation does not appear to have been conducted in good faith, or with any intention either of finding the facts or of excluding persons known to be disqualified. A committee was appointed in each house. In the senate the majority of the committee found all the members qualified; but there was a minority report which gave an abstract of the evidence and found four senators disqualified. The evidence consisted of the admissions of the senators themselves; which if true, they should have been excluded. Yet the senate passed a resolution, under the operation of the previous question, admitting them all. These facts appear in the official correspondence between Governor Bullock and General Meade in regard to the organization of the Georgia legislature. (See Exhibit A.) There were three reports in the house. The majority report found two members disqualified; one of the minority reports found still another member disqualified, but the other minority report found that all were qualified. The last report was adopted by the house under the operation of the previous question. To illustrate the manner in which the investigation was conducted, a copy of the proceedings of the legislature on the 16th, 17th, and 18th days of July, 1868, as reported in the Atlanta Daily Era, and forwarded to the State Department, is attached to this report. (See Exhibits A, B, and C.) It is alleged that an impartial investigation would have shown from thirty to forty members of the legislature disqualified under the fourteenth amendment; and although your committee have not been able to fully investigate this matter, but, from the evidence before them, they have little doubt that the number was large, as the exhibit hereto attached will tend to establish. For the purposes of this report, however, your committee did not deem it necessary to ascertain the number of disqualified persons admitted. But the fact that any were knowingly admitted was not only a violation of the fourteenth amendment, and a failure to comply with the requirements of Congress, but manifests a disposition to disobey and defy the authority of the United States. If one could be admitted why not all? And will it be contended that if the entire body had been composed of men who had usurped the functions of the legislature, against the express provisions of the reconstruction acts, they could have complied with the provisions of those acts so as to create any obligation on the part of Congress to receive their Senators and Representatives?

Your committee are of opinion that the act of June 25, 1868, which required that the constitutional amendment should be duly ratified, must be held to mean that it must be ratified by a legislature which has in good faith substantially complied with all the requirements of law providing for its organization. It is true that after this pretended investigation by the two houses of the eligibility of their members the district commander recognized the validity of their proceedings, and permitted the State officers to be inaugurated and the State government to go into operation. On the 21st day of July the legislature passed a resolution of ratification of the fourteenth amendment and the other resolution required by the act of June 25, 1868.

On the 28th of July, 1868, the legislature went into joint convention for the election of United States Senators. Joshua Hill received 110 votes; Joseph E. Brown, 94 votes, and A. H. Stevens, 3 votes, whereupon Mr. Hill was declared elected United States Senator for the term ending March 3, 1873.

It is quite probable that Mr. Hill received votes of persons who were not qualified to hold seats in the legislature more than sufficient to constitute his majority and secure his election, but your committee do not propose to investigate that question. The election and qualification of members of the legislature, where the existence of any legislature authorized to act as such is not involved, cannot be inquired into by the Senate in determining the right of a Senator to his seat. Your committee hold that the question involved in this case is not whether persons not entitled to seats in the legislature were received by that body and allowed to vote upon the election of a Senator, but whether the body assuming to be the legislature violated the conditions upon which it was allowed to organize by permitting disloyal persons to participate in its proceedings. It may be contended that although the matters hereinbefore set forth constitute a failure on the part of the State of Georgia to comply in every respect with the reconstruction acts, yet Congress ought to waive these slight departures and admit their representatives. But an examination into the subsequent proceedings of the legislature of Georgia, and the disorganized condition of society in that State, leads your committee to the conclusion that all these violations of law were in pursuance of a common purpose to evade the law and resist the authority of the United States.

The colored members in the organization of the legislature, as has been stated, were allowed to take their seats. On the 9th of July, 1868, the day after such organization, the following action was had in regard to the three colored senators:

"Mr. Welch moved that the action taken on yesterday, in regard to the eligibility of certain members, be reconsidered. Agreed to.

"Mr. Sherman moved to strike out that portion of Mr. Candler's resolution which refers to the eligibility of Messrs. Campbell, Wallace, and Bradley.

"Mr. Candler moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

"Mr. Bradley, being entitled to the floor, resumed his speech of yesterday, in opposition to the amendment of Mr. Candler, and was followed by Mr. Campbell.

"The matter was finally referred to the committee on privileges and elections."

Thus this vexed question was quietly smothered for the time. But Mr. Candler, on the 25th of July (a few days before the Senatorial election), offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table:

"Whereas ex-Governor Joseph E. Brown, one of the ablest lawyers in the Republican party of Georgia, as well as other persons, distinguished for their knowledge of constitutional law, held, during the late canvass, that persons of color were not entitled to hold office under the existing constitution; and

"Whereas such persons hold seats as senators on this floor; and

"Whereas there are laws of vital importance to the people of Georgia to be enacted by the general assembly, the validity of which should not be made uncertain because of a participation of their enactment by persons not entitled, under the constitution, to so participate: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the committee on privileges and elections be directed to inquire into the eligibility of the several persons of color holding seats as senators and report at the earliest day practicable."

Mr. Hungerford moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion prevailed.

The question remained unsettled until after the Senatorial election and the adjournment of Congress. But on the 3d of September, 1868, the house of representatives of Georgia expelled twenty-four of its members on account of color, and subsequently expelled two more for the same reason, and on the 11th day of same month the senate expelled two of its members for a like reason, making twenty-eight members of the legislature that were expelled by the two houses without authority of law. For a full account of these proceedings see Exhibit D.

After the expulsion of the colored members the persons who received the next highest number of votes for their places, under what is known in Georgia as the Irwin code, were permitted to take their seats. But no investigation as to their eligibility under the fourteenth amendment appears to have been had. (See Exhibit D.)

Your committee are of opinion that under the constitution of Georgia there is no distinction in the right to hold office on account of race or color, and they are quite confident that such was the opinion of Congress at the time it approved that constitution.

This act of injustice and oppression denied the right of representation of a whole race, constituting nearly one-half of the people of Georgia. It will not be contended that there is no power in this Government to restrain in some form an outrage of this character. It certainly furnishes a strong reason why Congress should not at this time overlook the irregularities in the organization of the legislature of Georgia, and admit her Senators to representation. And this is not all. Your committee have examined the official reports of the various officers connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in Georgia, and find reported 336 cases of murders and assaults with intent to murder upon colored persons by the whites, from January 1, 1868, to November 15 of same year. For all of which there has been no legal redress and scarcely any effort whatever on the part of the authorities to punish the criminals. And it is stated by these officers that they are unable to report fully as to the number and character of these outrages on account of intimidation of witnesses, which is practiced by the perpetrators of crime. Your committee have no source of official information as to outrages committed upon loyal whites, but it is represented by various and numerously signed petitions and memorials from the loyal people of Georgia that they are constantly exposed to violence, and are without protection of law. It is a matter of public notoriety that loyal white men are persecuted, murdered, and driven from their homes. Several members of the legislature have been compelled to take refuge at the capital of the State where the national troops are stationed to avoid the violence of the enemies of the United States. The unlawful and vindictive conduct of the legislature tend to confirm these statements and reports, and exclude all hope that the new civil government will afford adequate protection to life and property. Since the withdrawal of the military crime has greatly increased, while punishment for crime has diminished. Wherefore your committee feel called upon to recommend that Mr. Hill be not allowed to take a seat in the Senate for the reason that Georgia is not entitled to representation in Congress, and submit the accompanying resolution.

Resolved, That Joshua Hill, claiming to be Senator-elect from Georgia, ought not now to be permitted to take a seat in this body.

I concur in the conclusion of the report that Mr. Hill ought not to be admitted, and agree that the report be made.

ROSCOE CONKLING.

I concur in the conclusion of the report that Mr. Hill ought not now to be admitted, and agree that the report be made.

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. Trumbull asked and obtained leave to submit the following as the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of Joshua Hill, Senator-elect from Georgia:

The undersigned, being unable to agree with the majority of the committee in their report upon the credentials of Joshua Hill, claiming to have been duly elected and entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Georgia, begs leave to present the reasons for his dissent. That Hill possesses all the qualifications for a member of the Senate of the United States required by the Constitution; that he is one of the few prominent men residing in a rebel State who remained true to the Union during the war; that he is now and has been at all times thoroughly loyal to the Union; that he is in every respect personally unobjectionable; that he was duly elected by the legislature of Georgia, and that his credentials are in due form is not questioned by any one. If he is not entitled to his seat, it must be either because the State of Georgia was not in a condition to entitle her to representation at the time of his election, or because the body which elected him was not the legislature of that State.

The former of these propositions, whether Georgia was or is in a condition to entitle her to representation, is not a question for the Senate to decide. The unfortunate disagreement which has existed for some years between the President and Congress has, in part, been owing to a disagreement upon this very point; the President insisting that it was for each House of Congress to determine for itself in the admission of members whether a State was entitled to representation, and Congress insisting that it was for Congress to determine in the first instance whether a State was entitled to representation, and that question being affirmatively settled, it was then for each House to judge for itself of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members. This controverted point was settled by Congress in March, 1866, by the passage through both Houses of the following concurrent resolution:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation."

The reconstruction acts, since indorsed by the people at a popular election, declare that "until the people of said rebel States shall be by law—not by the action of each House—admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only;" which is equivalent to a declaration that when admitted to representation by law they shall be no longer provisional.

The supplementary act of March 23, 1867, declares that when the requirements of the reconstruction acts shall have been complied with by any of the rebel States in the formation of a constitution, and "said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom, as therein provided." This action of Congress, indorsed by the people, determined that neither House of Congress was authorized by itself to admit Senators or Representatives from any of the rebel States till Congress should determine by law that such State was entitled to representation. The converse of the proposition was also equally determined, that it would be the duty of each House to admit duly elected and qualified Senators and Representatives from each of said States whenever Congress shall have determined by law that such State was entitled to representation.

On the 25th of June, 1868, Congress passed the following act:

"AN ACT to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama and Florida to representation in Congress.

"Whereas the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled 'An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of State government which are republican, and have adopted said constitutions by large majorities of the votes cast at the elections held for the ratification or rejection of the same: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union when the legislature of such State shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and known as article 14, upon the following fundamental conditions: That the constitutions of neither of said States shall ever be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote in said State, who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of voters; and the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition: that the first and third subdivisions of section 17 of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first subdivision, shall be null and void, and that the general assembly of said State by solemn public act shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the day fixed for the first meeting of the legislature of either of said States by the constitution or ordinance thereof shall have passed or have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act that there shall not be time for the legislature to assemble at the period fixed, such legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act takes effect, unless the governor-elect shall sooner convene the same.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when such State shall, by its legislature, duly ratify article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia when it shall in addition give the assent of said State to the fundamental condition hereinbefore imposed upon the same; and thereupon the officers of each State duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States, or under any State, by section 3 of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article 14, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment; and it is hereby made the duty of the President within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment by the legislature of either of said States to issue a proclamation announcing that fact."

On the very day of the passage of the foregoing act Rufus B. Bullock, governor-elect of Georgia, issued his proclamation convening the legislature of that State on the 4th of July following. The manner in which the legislature was organized will fully appear from the following extract, taken from the official report of Major-General Meade:

"The convention in Georgia, after being in session several months, finally, in March, adopted a constitution, which together with a State ticket was submitted to the people in April, and ratified by a very handsome majority of the registered vote—all parties taking part in the election. This constitution, with some modifications, was adopted by Congress, and the legislature, which convened in July, making these modifications and otherwise complying with the requirements of the reconstruction laws, the State, together with Alabama and Florida, were, by act of Congress, formally admitted to representation.

"There is one point in regard to the admission of the State of Georgia to which I feel called upon to make special allusion. When the legislature was convened by the provisional governor and governor-elect, the question arose whether, as military commander, I was called on to inquire into the eligibility of the members, either under the United States laws or the constitution of Georgia. The convention of Georgia had, in its ordinance calling an election, directed that all returns should be sent to the military commander of the district, who was requested to issue the necessary certificates of election In carrying out this request of the convention I deemed my duty simply required that I should give the member having the greatest number of votes the ordinary certificate of election, and that it would be for each house to decide on the eligibility of those members whose seats were on any grounds contested. Whilst I admitted, as district commander, executing the law, I was to see that no one ineligible to office under the fourteenth article constitutional amendment should be allowed to take office, I did not see that in the case of a parliamentary body I was called on to decide on the qualifications of the members. In this view I was sustained by a telegram sent to me for my information from the War Department, which had been sent to the governor of Louisiana and the military commander of the fifth district, and which I quote:

"'WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

"'To Governor WARMOUTH, New Orleans:

"'We think the persons disqualified under the fourteenth article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States are not eligible to your legislature. This is to be determined by the respective houses; but no oath can be imposed except the oath prescribed by the State constitution.

"'JAMES WILSON,
"'Chairman Judiciary Committee.
"'GEORGE F. BOUTWELL,
"'J. F. FARNSWORTH,
"'H. E. PAINE,
"'Reconstruction Committee.'

"It will be seen by the above telegram that the distinguished gentlemen whose names were attached were of the opinion, first, that no one ineligible to office under the fourteenth article could take a seat in the legislature; second, that the respective houses were to judge of the question; third, that no oath testing this eligibility could or should be prescribed in advance of the meeting of the legislature. These views being in accordance with my own, I acted on them, and was present at the organization of the two houses of the Georgia legislature; to the members declared in my order as having the highest number of votes, there being administered only the oath prescribed by the State constitution. After these houses were organized, the provisional governor informed me officially of their organization, but that, as far as he could learn, no steps had been taken to test the question of the eligibility of members under the fourteenth article. I replied to the governor that until the State was admitted to representation the legislature and all the officers were only provisional, and subject to the paramount authority of the district commander, and that in the exercise of this power I should consider all acts of the legislature null and void until satisfactory evidence was presented to me that each house had purged itself of ineligible members under the fourteenth article, provided there were any such in either house; and I desired the provisional governor to communicate these views to each house. On the receipt of this letter, each house at once ordered an investigating committee and inquired into the qualification of each member, and duly reported this fact through the provisional governor, stating at the same time that neither house had found any member ineligible.

"The provisional governor, in transmitting these communications, expressed the opinion, founded on evidence presented to him, that several members in both houses were ineligible, and called on me to exercise my power and require said members to vacate their seats. On reflecting upon this subject, I could not see how I was to take the individual judgment of the provisional governor in the face of a solemn act of a parliamentary body, especially as, from the testimony presented, I did not, in several cases, agree with the judgment of the provisional governor. The question was simply whether, in the construction of a law, and in considering the facts of individual cases, I should make myself the judge, or take the opinion of the provisional governor, in the face of the official information that a parliamentary body had gravely and formally, through a committee, examined, reported, and acted on these cases. My judgment was decidedly that I had fulfilled my duty in compelling the houses to take the action they had, and that having thus acted, I had neither the authority, nor was it politic or expedient, to overrule their action, and set up my individual judgment in opposition. By an inspection of the telegram sent July 18, and the reply of the General-in-chief, July 23, it will be seen that my views and actions were approved. I allude thus in extenso to this subject, because his excellency the governor of Georgia, in a public speech recently delivered at Albion, N. Y., is pleased to attribute the failure of Georgia to be properly reconstructed to my action in failing to purge the legislature of his political opponents, he having advised me, when he urged such action, that his friends had been relieved of their disability by Congress.

"The States being admitted to representation, the civil power vested in the military commander by the reconstruction acts ceased, and civil authority resumed its sway."

The foregoing extract, together with copies of official correspondence between Major-General Meade and General Grant, hereto attached, establish the fact that the legislature of Georgia fully complied with the requisitions of the act of June 25, 1868; and the fact of her ratification of the fourteenth amendment was duly proclaimed by the President, as also appears by a copy of the proclamation hereto attached.

Congress having decided that Georgia was entitled to representation through the State government organized under the reconstruction acts, on complying with the conditions therein named, it is not competent for either house, now that the conditions have been complied with, to refuse admission to members on the ground that the State is not entitled to representation. For either House to do so would be for such House to set aside a solemn act of Congress, passed by both Houses, and to repudiate the principle on which it differed with the President and went before the people in the popular elections. The House of Representatives, conforming to the law of Congress, has admitted to seats the Representatives from Georgia against whom no personal objection was made, without any further inquiry than whether Georgia had complied with the conditions of the act of June 25, 1868. No attempt was made in that body to revise the decision of Congress.

The assumption that the constitutional amendment was not adopted in good faith is not sustained by a particle of evidence before the committee, and is contradicted by the official report of Governor Bullock to General Meade, by the orders of General Meade, and those emanating from the General-in-chief, by the proclamation of the President, made in pursuance of law, by the action of the House of Representatives in passing upon the admission of members to that body, and by the acquiescence of all the departments of Government from July until now. If one branch of Congress is at liberty to deny a State representation on the ground that it did not act in good faith in agreeing to the conditions prescribed by Congress, what is to prevent either House of any other Congress, acting on a like assumption, from denying admission to members from any other of the reconstructed States? It is well known that a large political party in the country believe the reconstruction acts unconstitutional. Should that party hereafter obtain ascendency in either House of Congress, is it to be at liberty to overturn the State governments which have been established in pursuance of law and to quote as a precedent the action of the Senate in this case? When are we to have peace and civil governments established in the late rebel States under such a policy? The question has been asked if one person disqualified by the fourteenth amendment could be permitted to act as a member of the Georgia legislature, why not all; and if all, would it be pretended that it was a legislature organized in accordance with the reconstruction acts? Probably not; and the same question, with the same force, may be asked in reference to Congress or any other legislative body in the land. If a disqualified person or several such were permitted to act as members of Congress or a State legislature, does anybody pretend that the action of the body would be vitiated thereby, and yet who would not admit that if a body of men were to assemble and undertake to act as the Congress or the legislature of a State, all of whom were disqualified from acting as such, that their action would have any validity? No such case is to be presumed, and no legislative body is justified or safe in basing its action on suppositious cases which never have and are not likely ever to occur. No such state of facts is presented in the case of Georgia. Not one in ten of the members of the senate, after deducting those from whom the disabilities had been removed by Congress, and not one in fifty of the members of the house were found disqualified by even the minority of the committee who investigated this subject, and each house decided all its members to be qualified. The constitution of Georgia, which was accepted by Congress, like that in all the other States, and like the Constitution of the United States, in regard to Congress, leaves to each house the exclusive right to judge for itself of the election and returns of its own members, and that judgment, when pronounced, is conclusive everywhere. There was not a shadow of anything deserving the name of evidence before the committee to show that either house of the legislature of Georgia acted corruptly or fraudulently in passing upon the right of members to their seats under the fourteenth amendment.

The Senate has no right, in the opinion of the undersigned, to revise the action of Congress, disregard its laws, and refuse Hill his seat, because in its opinion Georgia is not entitled to representation, when Congress has decided otherwise, and the Executive and the General-in-chief have acted on that decision. It being admitted that Hill is entitled to his seat if Georgia is entitled to be represented in the Senate, and it being shown that Georgia has been declared by law to be entitled to representation on certain conditions, which are shown to have been complied with, the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that Hill was entitled to take his seat. That it is competent for the Senate, in passing upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, to inquire whether the body by which a Senator was elected was the legislature of the State is not disputed; but it is not pretended that Georgia had any other legislative assembly than the one which elected Mr. Hill claiming to be a legislature. The legislative body which elected him was the one which was convened by the governor in pursuance of an act of Congress; the one which ratified the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution as proclaimed both by the President and Secretary of State, in accordance with the requirements of law; and the one, and the only one, which has been elected and assembled in said State under the constitution formed in pursuance of the reconstruction acts and approved by Congress. The legislature of Georgia, under its constitution, consists of forty-four senators and one hundred and seventy-five representatives, and the complaint is, not that the persons properly chosen and qualified would not and did not constitute the legislature, but that "there were a number of persons holding seats in both branches of the legislature that were and are not eligible under the fourteenth constitutional amendment."

Each house appointed committees, who investigated the question of the eligibility of the members of their respective houses under that amendment; and, on their report, each house decided that all its sitting members were entitled to seats. Whether these decisions were correct or not is not material to Hill's right to a seat, as it is not pretended, even by the minority of the committees appointed to investigate, that more than four senators out of forty-four, omitting those whose disabilities had been removed by act of Congress, and three representatives, out of one hundred and seventy-five, were disqualified by the fourteenth amendment.

No evidence was taken by the Judiciary Committee to ascertain how many or whether any of the members of either house were ineligible.

The statements of letter-writers and memorialists cannot surely be treated as evidence upon which to overthrow a State government. The only reliable information the committee had on that subject is contained in the official report of Major-General Meade, and the journal of the legislature, as published in a newspaper. From these it appears that only four senators and three representatives were complained against by any one in the legislature as disqualified by the fourteenth amendment.

If it were admitted that the decision of each house was wrong in regard to the eligibility of the members complained against it would not vitiate the proceedings of the legislature. Scarcely a legislature assembles in any of the States in which there are not controversies in regard to seats, and it often happens that these are not settled till near the close of the session, when, perhaps, sitting members are turned out; and yet, who ever supposed that the proceedings of a legislative body were vitiated because they were participated in by persons whom it afterwards turned out were not entitled to seats? But whether each house of the legislature of Georgia decided rightly or not as to the eligibility of its members is not a question for the Senate to review. The Senate has no jurisdiction to inquire whether the members of a State legislature are properly elected and qualified.

If it could make this inquiry in regard to the members of the legislature of Georgia, which had been declared entitled to representation, it could make it in regard to the legislature of Illinois, or any other State. No one, I apprehend, would contend for such a power in Congress. It does not follow that Congress may not provide the means for executing the fourteenth amendment. There can be no question of its power to pass a law making it a penal offense for any person to take or hold office contrary to the provisions of that amendment. Another objection made to the organization of the Georgia legislature is that its members did not take the test oath required by the ninth section of the act of July 19, 1867, to be administered to all persons appointed to office under any of the so-called State governments in the rebel States; but obviously that requirement did not apply to members of a legislature elected under a constitution formed in pursuance of the reconstruction acts, and so General Grant, Major-General Meade, and the Judiciary Committee of the House decided. Another objection urged against Mr. Hill's right to a seat is the fact that the legislature of Georgia unjustly denied the right of certain colored members to seats. However unjust this denial may have been, it did not take place till more than a month after Hill's election. He was elected July 28, and the colored members participated in all legislation till September 3.

It is difficult to perceive how an act subsequent to the election could affect its validity. If the legislature was properly organized when it elected Hill, the fact that it subsequently became disorganized ought not to affect his election.

There is great diversity of opinion as to the condition of affairs in Georgia at this time. The committee have taken no testimony on that subject, but it is understood that a committee of the House of Representatives have taken a large mass of evidence as to the present state of affairs in Georgia, which will soon be printed.

Time and the salutary influence of the incoming administration, it is believed, will soon correct whatever of lawlessness and disorder now remain in the State. If, however, they should not, some way will doubtless be found by which Congress and the Executive, acting in harmony, and not the Senate alone, will be able to preserve the peace and protect all the citizens of Georgia in the enjoyment of all their rights. These considerations, however, should not affect the right of Mr. Hill to his seat in the Senate, and are only alluded to because of the importance attached to the present condition of affairs in Georgia by the majority of the committee. The undersigned, believing Mr. Hill to have been duly elected Senator by the legislature of a State entitled to representation, and that he possesses all the qualifications required by the Constitution, recommends striking out of the resolution reported by the committee all after the word "resolved," and the insertion of the following:

"That Joshua Hill is entitled to take his seat in the Senate on taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and laws."

LYMAN TRUMBULL.

CREDENTIALS OF MR. MILLER.

MONDAY, January 11, 1869.

Mr. Trumbull presented the credentials of H. V. M. Miller, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Georgia, for the unexpired portion of the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; which were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1869.

The President pro tempore presented resolutions adopted by the National Union Republican Association of Georgia, approving the platform and action of the Republican party and the policy of Governor Bullock; condemning the expulsion of colored members from the legislature of Georgia, and praying that Joshua Hill and H. V. M. Miller may not be admitted to the Senate as Senators from Georgia; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1869.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Hon. H. V. M. Miller, elected a Senator by the legislature of Georgia, reported against admitting him to a seat in the Senate.

[First session of the Forty-first Congress.]

CREDENTIALS OF MESSRS. HILL AND MILLER.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1869.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

Ordered, That the credentials of Joshua Hill and H. V. M. Miller, Senators-elect from the State of Georgia, on the files of the Senate, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1869.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Joshua Hill and H. V. M. Miller, elected Senators by the legislature of the State of Georgia, reported them back to the Senate and moved that they lie on the table; which motion was agreed to.

[Mr. Trumbull stated (Congressional Globe, 1st sess. 41st Cong., page 102) that the committee were of opinion that the credentials should lie upon the table until action had been taken upon the bill in regard to the State of Georgia; that he was opposed to that recommendation and believed it the duty of the Senate to act upon the credentials at once.]

CREDENTIALS OF MESSRS. HILL AND MILLER, AND WHITELEY AND FARROW.

[Second session of the Forty-first Congress.]

MONDAY, February 14, 1870.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

Ordered, That the credentials of H. V. M. Miller and Joshua Hill, as Senators from the State of Georgia, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRIDAY, July 15, 1870.

Mr. Stewart presented the credentials of Richard H. Whiteley, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Georgia for the unexpired portion of the term ending March 3, 1871; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

Mr. Stewart presented the credentials of Henry P. Farrow, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Georgia for the unexpired portion of the term ending March 3, 1873; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

[Third session of the Forty-first Congress.]

TUESDAY, December 13, 1870.

On motion by Mr. Stewart,

Ordered, That the credentials of Richard H. Whiteley and Henry P. Farrow, Senators-elect from the State of Georgia, presented at the last session, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONDAY, January 23, 1871.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Joshua Hill, H. V. M. Miller, Henry P. Farrow, and Richard H. Whiteley, claiming to be Senators-elect from the State of Georgia, submitted a report (No. 308), accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Joshua Hill has been duly elected Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Georgia, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws."

Mr. Stewart asked, and obtained, leave of the Senate to submit the views of a minority of the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to the election of Senators from the State of Georgia.

Ordered, That they be printed to accompany the report of the Committee of the Judiciary thereon.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MAJORITY AND MINORITY.*

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Stewart, Edmunds, Conkling, Rice, Carpenter, and Thurman.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JANUARY 23, 1871.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Joshua Hill, H. V. M. Miller, Henry P. Farrow, and Richard H. Whiteley, claiming to have been elected Senators from the State of Georgia, submit the following report:

The credentials of all four of the claimants are sufficiently formal to entitle them to seats if they were otherwise entitled, but it is manifest that only two can be admitted under any circumstances. The Constitution declares that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof."

The history of the reconstruction of the State of Georgia is succinctly set forth in a report made to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee on the 2d of March last, from which the following are extracts:

"The acts of Congress of March 2, 1867, and March 23, 1867, called the reconstruction acts, made all existing government in that State provisional, and subject to the paramount authority of Congress. That paramount authority, by the same act, confided to the military arm of the executive department certain specified powers and duties for the preservation of peace and order in the State, until the people of this State should frame a new government and elect public officers under it, and be admitted again into full relation with the Union.

"Under these acts, and particularly that of June 25, 1868, a form of government was adopted by the people of Georgia, and they elected under it a legislature and governor. And in July, 1868, after sundry difficulties touching the eligibility of certain members of the legislature had been disposed of by the legislature, with the approval of the general in command of the district, the new government was by him declared duly organized, and the governor was inaugurated, and the conduct of affairs was thereupon by the military commander turned over to the civil officers, and the military authority ceased.

"The culmination of this action is found in the following orders of General Meade, commanding the district:

"'[General Orders No. 101.]

"'HEADQUARTERS THIRD MILITARY DISTRICT, "'DEPARTMENT OF GEORGIA, FLORIDA, AND ALABAMA,
"'Atlanta, Ga., July 14, 1868.

"'Whereas official information has been received at these headquarters from the governor-elect of the State of Alabama that the legislature of said State, elected under the provisions of General Orders No. 101, series of 1867, from these headquarters, had assembled and complied with the requisitions of the act of Congress, which became a law June 25, 1868, entitled "An act to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress;" and whereas said act states that on compliance with the conditions therein set forth by any State the officers of said State, duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof, shall be inaugurated without delay: It is therefore ordered—

"'I. That all civil officers holding office in this State, whether by military appointment or by failure to have successors qualified, shall promptly yield their offices and turn over to their properly elected and qualified successors all public property, archives, books, records, &c., belonging to the same.

"'II. Whenever the military commander of the subdistrict of Alabama is officially notified of the inauguration of the State government-elect, military authority, under the acts of Congress known as the reconstruction laws, will be at an end in said State; and it is made the duty of the subdistrict commander to transfer everything appertaining to the government of said State to the proper civil officers, and to abstain in future, upon any pretext whatever, from any interference with, or control over, the civil authorities of the State, or the persons and property of the citizens thereof.

"'III. On the inauguration of the civil government all prisoners held in custody or by bonds for offenses against the civil law will be turned over to the proper civil authority. In the mean time writs of habeas corpus from the United States courts will be respectfully obeyed, and the decisions conformed to. Writs from State courts will have respectful returns made, stating prisoners are held by authority of the United States, and can only be released by writs issued by United States courts.

"The State being then in fact relieved from military government, proceeded, in the manner provided by its constitution, to appoint judges and other officers of justice, and to fill up completely its organization of State government.

"The legislature, in the forms prescribed by the laws of the United States, proceeded to elect Senators to represent the State in Congress, and it also passed many laws.

"During all this time, however, certain persons—variously claimed to number from ten to twenty-five, but not so numerous as to affect the organization of the legislature in respect to a constitutional quorum of legal members—held seats in the legislature under the forms of election, but who were or are understood to have been disqualified therefor by force of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

"After these events, and in September, 1868, a majority of the senate and house of representatives, respectively, including the persons so claimed to have been disqualified, proceeded to decide that persons of African descent (of whom there were several in each house) could not, for that cause, hold seats in the legislature, and to exclude them therefrom in a body, without giving them any voice in deciding the question; and thereupon they filled up the seats so made vacant by the admission of the white persons having the next largest number of votes at the election for members of the legislature.

"These events last named, and the circumstances existing in connection with them, led to the passage of the act of December 22, 1869.

"The first section of that act made it the duty of 'the governor of the State of Georgia to summon all persons elected to the general assembly of said State, as appears by the proclamation of George G. Meade, general,' &c., dated June 25, 1868, to appear at the capitol on a day named.

"And it further directed that 'thereupon the said general assembly of said State shall proceed to perfect its organization in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States, according to the provisions of this act.'

"The persons named in this act, and in the proclamation, were those only who had received a majority of the votes at the election; and they were, in the aggregate, the same body of men who had composed the legislature at its organization, and thenceforth, until the exclusion of the negro members and the introduction of minority candidates into their places.

"The law, thus ascertaining the persons who were to assemble, then proceeds to direct that 'the said general assembly shall proceed to perfect its organization,' &c. No authority is conferred upon the governor to do it, nor upon the military commander. The power and duty to perfect its organization is conferred on the assembly exclusively by the very words of the act. There is no room for inference or construction.

"The next three sections provide the method by which the houses are to perfect their organization, i. e., by taking certain oaths and by the election of officers, and they also provide that the neglect to take such oaths shall disqualify the persons so neglecting and make them ineligible to seats, and that false swearing in taking such oaths shall be perjury, and be punished as such.

"The next section (5th) provides severe penalties for any interference with the taking of such oaths and participation in the proceedings.

"The seventh section requires the President to employ the military forces of the United States so far 'as may be necessary to enforce and execute the preceding provisions of this act.'

"Under this act the governor of Georgia did summon the persons elected to the legislature, as named in the proclamation of General Meade, to assemble at the State-house in Atlanta on the 10th day of January, 1870.

"In pursuance of this proclamation the geater part, and nearly all the persons named, assembled at the time and place named.

"A quorum of the Senate took the oaths prescribed, and organized as provided for in the act.

"The members of the house of representatives were called to order by one Harris, not a member or officer, but who had been designated for that purpose by the governor. Some of the members protested against this and attempted to elect a speaker pro tempore, but were prevented by said Harris and his assistants; and thenceforth, until the final organization of the house, Harris continued to preside and to adjourn the body from time to time, according to his own pleasure, without consulting the house, and to determine what persons who had appeared as members should be permitted, from day to day, to take the prescribed oaths, and take their seats.

"This proceeding was in substance ratified by the general in command at Atlanta, who had been, after the passage of the act of December 22, 1869, appointed to the command of Georgia, as a military district under the act of March 2, 1867.

"It having been suggested to the general in command that sundry persons had taken or were about to take the oaths prescribed in the act of December 22, 1869, falsely, he directed that those accused of such improper conduct or purpose should, for the time being, be excluded from participation in the proceedings, and thereupon organized a board of military officers for the purposes set forth in the following general orders:

"'In pursuance of instructions received from the headquarters of the Army, a board is hereby appointed to inquire into the eligibility of W. T. Winn, of Cobb County; John J. Welborn, of Union County, to seats in the legislature of Georgia, under the reconstruction acts.

"'The board will meet and organize at once, and will have power to administer oaths and send for persons and papers. They will permit the persons whose eligibility is in question to appear before them either in person or by attorney, and will also permit the appearance before them of persons who deny the eligibility of said W. T. Winn, J. J. Collier, A. W. Holcomb, W. J. Anderson, B. B. Hinton, and C. J. Welborn.

"'The board will keep a complete and accurate record of the proceedings and of all testimony which may be given before them, and will transmit the same to these headquarters with its report.

"'The board of officers convened by General Orders No. 3, current series, from these headquarters, is hereby directed, in addition to the duty assigned to them by that order, to inquire into the eligibility under the reconstruction acts of the following-named members-elect of the house of representatives, viz:

"'Isham Raddish, of Appling County; R. W. Phillips, of Echols County; E. M. Taliaferro, of Fulton County; J. H. Nunn, of Glascock County; R. A. Donaldson, of Gordon County; W. P. "The board proceeded to discharge its duties, and on the 25th day of January, 1870 the result of its action was promulgated as follows:

"'[General Orders No. 9.]

"'HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DISTRICT OF GEORGIA,
"'Atlanta, Ga., January 25, 1870.

"'Whereas the board convened by General Orders No. 3, current series, from these headquarters, consisting of Bvt. Maj. Gen. T. H. Ruger, colonel Eighteenth United States Infantry; Bvt. Brig. Gen. T. J. Haines, commissary of subsistence; and Maj. Henry Goodfellow, judge advocate, United States Army, has made its report in writing, by which it appears that R. A. Donaldson, of Gordon County; E. M. Taliaferro, of Fulton County, and J. H. Nunn, of Glascock County, members-elect of the house of representatives of Georgia, are not eligible to seats therein under the laws of the United States: Therefore it is hereby ordered that the said R. A. Donaldson, E. M. Taliaferro, and J. H. Nunn be, and they hereby are, prohibited from taking part in the organization of said house, or from attempting to exercise the functions of a member thereof; and

"'Whereas the said board have found that Thomas F. Rainey, of Schley County; J. N. Harris, of Murray County; R. W. Phillips, of Echols County; L. C. A. Warren, of Quitman County; Joseph D. Smith, of Ware County; W. P. Price, of Lumpkin County; J. B. Sorrels, of Walton County; G. N. Harper, of Sumter County; C. C. Humber, of Stewart County; L. H. Walthall, of Polk County; and Isham Raddish, of Appling County, are eligible to seats in the said house under the laws of the United States, no objections will be made to their participating as members in the organization of the house; and

"'Whereas it appears that Frank Wilchar, of Taylor County, has since the commencement of the session of the board been, and is now reported to be, absent from the city, so that the board has not been able to determine in his case, it is therefore ordered that the said board still hold his case under consideration, and that in the mean time, and until his case be heard and determined, said Wilchar be prohibited from taking any part in the organization or participating in the proceedings of the house; and

"'Whereas J. B. Burtz, of Mitchell County; J. A. Brinson, of Emanuel County; A. T. Bennett, of Jackson County; A. M. George, of Baker County; David Goff, of Randolph County; William J. Hudson, of Harris County; D. Johnson, of Wilcox County; Henry C. Kellogg, of Forsyth County; J. W. Meadows, of Johnson County; J. H. Penland, of Union County; Robert C. Surrency, of Tatnall County; J. R. Smith, of Coffee County; Hiram Williams, of Dooly County; John C. Drake, of Upson County; J. T. Ellis, of Spalding County; J. M. Routh, of Worth County, persons elected to said house, have refused, declined, neglected, or been unable to take one of the oaths prescribed by the act of December 22, 1869, although ample opportunity so to do has been given them, and have thus by the terms of said act become ineligible to seats in said house, and have also filed with the Hon. R. B. Bullock, governor, their applications to the Congress of the United States for relief from their disabilities, thus admitting their ineligibility to hold the offices to which they were elected: It is therefore ordered that the said persons be, and they hereby are, prohibited from taking seats in said house or participating in the organization or proceedings thereof.

"'By order of Brevet Major-General Terry:

"'J. H. TAYLOR,
"'Assistant Adjutant-General.'

"By this action three of the members-elect of the house were excluded on proof of their ineligibility, and eleven admitted on proof of their being eligible.

"One person was prohibited from participating until the further order of the general, he not having arrived at Atlanta, and his case not having been disposed of.

"And it was further declared that sixteen other members-elect were excluded from participating in the proceedings, as having refused, declined, neglected, or been unable to take the oaths, although ample opportunity so to do had been afforded them, and because they had applied for relief from disabilities.

"These steps having been taken, the persons admitted to seats proceeded to elect a speaker on the 26th of January, 1870, and the result was officially communicated to headquarters at Washington, as follows:

"'ATLANTA, Ga., January 26, 1870.

"'House organized this morning by electing McWhorter, Republican candidate, as speaker. On report of board three persons were excluded as ineligible; eleven of those inquired into were pronounced eligible; sixteen who refused to take oath were declared to have become ineligible by their refusal; and one, whose case was sent to the board, having failed to appear, and being absent from the city, was forbidden to take part in organization. After careful examination of act of December 22, I decided that the fourth section would not permit me to seat the next highest candidates in place of ineligible persons.

"'General E. D. TOWNSEND.'

"The intervening action of the military commander terminated at this time.

"Upon this history the committee are constrained to say that, in their opinion, the before-stated action of the military authorities was not authorized by law.

"The legislature elected in Georgia under the acts of Congress authorizing it was not a part of the government declared by the law not to be legal and to be provisional; but it was a part of the new government designed by Congress to take the place of the provisional government, as a permanent one. This seems perfectly clear from the words of the law; and this view of the subject was taken by the General of the Army by his order to General Meade, of March 2, 1868 (Meade's Rep., page 24), and again in the same way on the 29th of April, 1868 (Meade's Rep., page 30), as follows:

"'WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1868.

"'The election proposed by the convention for officers under the new constitution I do not consider as an election for officers under the provisional government, referred to in section 6 of the act approved March 2, 1867. It is clear to my mind that a proper construction of section 4 of act approved March 23, 1867, does not authorize district commanders to fix or change the day of election after it has been designated by the convention.

"'Commanding Third Military District.'

"'HEADQUARTERS WAR DEPARTMENT,
"'Washington, D. C., April 29, 1868.

"'I have carefully read your letter of 16th April, and its inclosures. I see nothing in them to change my opinion as expressed to you in my dispatch of March 2, 1868.

"'The officers elected under the new constitution of Georgia are not officers of the provisional government referred to in the reconstruction acts, nor are they officers elected under any so-called State authority, and are not therefore required to take the oath prescribed in section 9, act of July 19, 1867. The eligibility to hold office must be determined by the new constitution, and the amendment to the Constitution of the United States designated as article 14.

"'U. S. GRANT, General.

"'Maj. Gen. GEORGE G. MEADE,
"'Commanding Third Military District.'

"It does not follow from this that a legislature thus situated, and before the admission of the State, is independent of the laws of Congress. It is not; but it is thought that the correction of any misbehavior of it or its members rests with Congress, and not with the military.

"But however this might have been under the acts of March, 1867, the act of December 22, 1869, must be the special guide for the present purpose. It must be supposed that it speaks the will of Congress, even though that will may not accord with the acts of 1867, and even though it should be conceded (as it is not) that it would have been better had full discretion over the seating of the members of the Georgia legislature been left to the general in command. The question is what the law is, not what it might have been, or what it might be wished to be.

"The act only invokes military action in aid of what it provides shall be done; no more.

"The act, as has been seen, is clear and simple in its provisions. The governor was empowered to do one thing only, i. e., summon the members-elect.

"That being done, the next duty was imposed in express terms on the general assembly of Georgia and its several members. The consequences of a failure to perform that duty were next pointed out in explicit language, i. e., those who should neglect to qualify should not have seats, and those who should falsely obtain them should be punished by a specified civil tribunal in a specified way. And for these purposes, and subject to these conditions, it was provided, in order to secure the free and full compliance with the act, that any interference with members in their attempt to swear in, or in sitting, should be criminal.

"It has been suggested that the words in section 4, 'entitled to compose such legislature,' might be construed to vest in the military commander the power to decide what persons were entitled to sit; but it does not appear possible to do this in the face of the express prior provisions of the act giving every member the right of his own will to take one of the oaths prescribed, and in the face of the subsequent provisions declaring the interruption of any person 'elected as aforesaid' in taking the oaths and his seat to be criminal and punishable. But the clause in question does not look to conferring any authority, but is only a definition or description of the persons upon whom the law conferred the power to act, i. e., those who by Meade's proclamation were elected and who should swear in.

"It has been seen that the legislature, as originally elected and organized in 186–, was not a 'provisional' legislature within the purview of the acts of reconstruction, but that it was a State legislature authorized by Congress to be elected and assembled, but not having absolute legislative power until the admission of the State to representation. And in this condition it is worthy of notice that when the act of December 22, 1869, was under consideration, this committee reported it with a provision making the legislature 'provisional' until the further action of Congress, and that provision was rejected by the Senate.

"For these reasons the committee is of opinion that the acts of Harris beforementioned, and the action of the general in command in excluding the persons who either had taken or were willing to take the oaths provided were not warranted by law.

"The order excluding those who confessedly declined to take the oaths was purely ministerial, and may be regarded as in proper compliance with the seventh section of the act.

"It is due to the general in command to say that the circumstances justify the committee in reporting that his whole conduct in the affair was under the sincere belief that he was acting within the limits of his lawful authority, and that under circumstances of much difficulty and delicacy he conducted affairs (although outside of the law) in such a manner as to command the personal confidence and respect of all parties and persons concerned. And the committee is also of opinion that the three persons excluded, who desired to qualify, were persons who would have violated the act by taking the oath, so that in respect to them there was no actual injustice done.

"After the house of representatives had thus organized, it admitted to seats several persons who, in the elections, had been candidates against the persons so excluded, but had been beaten, receiving only a minority of the votes cast.

"On the hearing before the committee it was conceded that there was nothing in the constitution or laws of Georgia which would warrant such a proceeding, but it was contended that this action was warranted by the general principles of parliamentary law, which, it was claimed, authorized the body charged with deciding who is elected to treat as not cast all votes given for an ineligible candidate, and so to conclude that the eligible candidate having the greatest number of votes is the choice of the majority of the electors, although he in fact received only the votes of a minority.

"However this may be in cases in which a plurality elects, or in which the want of capacity in the candidate is of such a manifest and indisputable and notorious character as to warrant the presumption that the electors in voting for him intended to throw away their votes (which the committee do not decide), it is clear that no such rule can be applied to cases of the nature now under consideration, in which the test of eligibility is somewhat broader than the one existing at the time of the election, and in which, in either case, the question depends on the true application of the law to conclusions of facts to be drawn from various circumstances, not necessarily notorious or indisputable in their character.

"The committee are, therefore, obliged to conclude that the persons thus admitted were not lawfully entitled to seats in the Georgia legislature. And it should, perhaps, be mentioned that on the hearing before the committee on the occasion of the consideration of the act of December 22, 1869, it was contended by the persons asking congressional intervention in the affairs of Georgia that there was no authority for the seating of minority candidates by the legislature, as had been done on the expulsion of the negro members; and that one distinct ground upon which the passage of that act was rested as illegal and revolutionary was that fact. The interpretation of the law cannot be made to change according to the changing wishes of those who invoke its assistance.

"The committee, then, report, under the first-named resolution, that in the following respects the organization of said legislature has not been warranted by law:

"1. In the control and direction of its proceedings by Harris.

"2. In the exclusion from taking the oaths and from seats of the three members-elect who offered to swear in.

"3. In the seating of the persons not having a majority of the votes of the electors.

"In respect to the second resolution before recited, calling upon the committee to report whether any further legislation is necessary in respect to the organization of the legislature in Georgia, the committee report that a full hearing was given to both sides of the controversy there, and that the representatives of the great body of those who contended that the proceedings aforesaid had been illegal and irregular expressed their willingness that Congress should refrain from further interference with the organization and composition of the legislature, and leave it to proceed in the exercise of legislative functions, notwithstanding the matters before mentioned, if the provisions of the constitution of Georgia and the ordinance of its convention could be carried out, providing for a fresh election of one-half the senators and all of the members of the house of representatives in November, 1870. The other party justifies what has taken place, and of course objects to any action on the subject.

"In this condition of affairs, inasmuch as the errors of the general in command, before stated, do not appear to have worked any serious injustice in point of fact, and as the error in seating the minority candidates was committed by the house of representatives in the exercise of a right ordinarily belonging to it in the first instance; and inasmuch as it appears certain that the term of office of the members of the Georgia legislature and of its State government will expire at the same time that it would have done had the State been fully restored to its place in the Union in July, 1868, and do not commence or run from the date of her future admission to representation, and that without reference to what might be the legal or literal construction of the last clause of the second subdivision of the first section of the third article of the constitution of Georgia, in the following words: 'The general assembly may by law change the time of election, and the members shall hold until their successors are elected and qualified,' any interpretation of this constitution which should have the effect to allow the extension of the term of office of the members of its general assembly at their own will and pleasure, and without a fresh expression of the will of the people, would be contrary to the essential principles of free institutions, and, if carried into practice, subversive of a republican form of government in that State, which would authorize the constitutional intervention of the United States to correct it; and it could not have been the intention of the people, from whose adoption that constitution derives its authority, to confer such a power as this construction would give, nor could such have been the understanding of Congress when it passed the act of June 25, 1868; and inasmuch as the chief body of those aggrieved by the wrongs before stated is, upon the faith of this conclusion of the committee in the respects last mentioned, willing to accept the existing state of things; and as it appears to be of much importance to the people of the whole country as well as to the people of Georgia that the final and harmonious restoration of all the States lately in rebellion to full representation, privileges, and responsibilities as members of the Union should be accomplished at the earliest practicable moment, in order that the united and friendly efforts of the whole people may be given to the arts of peace and the means of true progress, the committee feel justified in omitting to recommend any further legislation on the subject of the organization of the legislature in Georgia."

Under the act of June 25, 1868, the legislature of Georgia, consisting by the constitution of that State of forty-four senators and one hundred and seventy-five representatives, was convened on the 4th of July, 1868, and, after having, so far as formality of procedure is concerned, complied with the provisions of that act, proceeded on the 28th of July, 1868, to the election of persons to represent said State in the Senate of the United States. The election was consummated in joint meeting of the two houses on the next day by the following vote: For Senator for the term ending March 4, 1873, Joshua Hill received 110 votes; Joseph E. Brown received 94 votes; Alex. H. Stephens received 1 vote; C. W. Styles received 1 vote; and Hill was declared duly elected. For Senator for the term ending March 4, 1871, the vote was as follows: H. V. M. Miller, according to the table as it appears in the journal, received 120 votes, but on counting the names of the persons recorded as voting, Miller received 117 votes; Foster Blodgett received 72 votes; J. L. Seward received 13 votes; A. T. Akerman received 6 votes; and Miller was declared duly elected. The colored members of the legislature, as well as those alleged to be disqualified, were present and participated in this election. It was not till September 3, more than a month afterward, that the legislature refused to recognize colored persons as members. Appended is a copy of the order of Major-General Meade, giving a list of the persons elected to the senate and house of representatives of Georgia, marked Exhibit A; also a copy of the vote in detail for Senators at the time Hill and Miller were elected, showing for whom each member voted, marked Exhibit B. Three of the members who voted for Hill, to wit, Donaldson, Taliaferro, and Nunn, after having taken the oaths required by the act of December 22, 1869, were, on investigation of a military commission, declared ineligible, and prohibited by military order from further participation in the reorganized legislature; and sixteen others, eleven of whom, to wit, Burtz, Drake, Ellis of Spalding County, George, Goff, Hudson, Johnson of Wilcox, Kellogg, Meadows, Penland, and Williams of Dooly, voted for Hill, and one of whom, Surrency, voted for Brown, were, by a like order, excluded from participating in said reorganization, as having refused or been unable to take the oaths required, and because they had applied for relief from political disabilities.

No inquiry into the eligibility of any of the sixteen thus excluded was made, and the order excluding two of them, to wit, Wilchar and Bennett, was subsequently revoked. Two others, M. J. Crawford and John C. Drake, have made affidavit that they were entitled to seats in the reorganized legislature, which by threats of prosecution they were deterred from occupying at the time. Their affidavits are appended, marked Exhibits C and D. Another of the sixteen, J. H. Penland, states as follows: "I was induced to sign an application for pardon through mistake, and did not mean thereby to admit that I labored under any disability to take the necessary oaths, and resume my seat in the house as a member from the county of Union." A copy of Penland's statement from the journal of the house is appended, marked Exhibit E.

The journal shows that Bradley, one of the senators who voted for Brown, was subsequently, on the 13th of August, 1868, declared to have been ineligible at the time of his election, in consequence of having been convicted of a penitentiary offense, the constitution of the State declaring any person ineligible who has been convicted of a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. Before the vote was taken declaring Bradley ineligible, he resigned his seat in the senate.

Deducting those who were excluded by military order from taking part in the reorganized legislature, the result would be as follows: Hill, 96 votes; Brown, 93 votes; Stephens, 1 vote; Styles, 1 vote.

If the votes of Crawford, Drake, and Penland, who claim that they were improperly deterred from taking part in the reorganized legislature, be counted, then Hill's vote would be 99; and if Bradley's vote be deducted, Brown would have but 92 votes. Seventeen of those who voted for Miller, namely, Donaldson, Mason, Taliaferro, Burtz, Drake, Ellis, George, Goff, Hudson, Johnson, Kellogg, Meadows, Penland, Rouse, Smith of Coffee, Surrency, and Williams, were excluded by military order from taking part in the reorganized legislature. Deducting these from the votes cast when he was elected, the result would be as follows: Miller, 100 votes; Blodgett, 72 votes; Seward, 13 votes, Akerman, 6 votes.

Besides the persons excluded by military order from taking part in the reorganized legislature, six senators, namely, Graham, Moore, Collier, Wynne, Anderson, and McCutchen, and four representatives, namely, Crawford, Long, Taliaferro, and McCullough, took no part in the legislature as reorganized, and minority candidates were seated in their places. No investigation into the eligibility of these six senators and four representatives appears to have been had. One of them (McCutchen) deceased about the time of the reorganization. The act of December 22, 1869, did not specify any time within which the persons declared elected by General Meade's proclamation should appear and qualify in the legislature as directed to be reorganized. Of the above senators and representatives, six, namely, Anderson, Moore, McCutchen, Crawford, Long, and Smith, voted for Hill, and one, Graham, voted for Styles.

The proceedings in the election of H. P. Farrow and R. H. Whiteley took place in the reorganized legislature, February 15 and 16, 1870. In the proceedings of Tuesday, February 15, in the house of representatives, the vote for Senator for the term ending March 4, 1873, was as follows: Henry P. Farrow, 80 votes; scattering, 2 votes. And for Senator for the term ending March 4, 1871, Richard H. Whiteley, 82 votes; scattering, 1 vote.

The constitution of Georgia declares that the senate shall consist of forty-four senators, and the house of representatives of one hundred and seventy-five representatives, and requires a majority of each house to constitute a quorum to do business. At the time of the election of the Senators last named one hundred and fifty-seven persons, of whom three were prohibited by military order from participating in the proceedings, and thirteen were minority candidates, whose names do not appear as elected by the proclamation of General Meade, had been sworn in as members of the house of representatives; and one of the sworn members, Robert Lumpkin, is said to have deceased before the Senatorial election. Deducting the thirteen minority members from the one hundred and fifty-seven, would leave one hundred and forty-four qualified members, of whom the journal shows but seventy-one to have been present at the time of Farrow's election by the house. If the three members excluded by military order, and the one said to have deceased, in addition to the minority members, be deducted, it would leave but one hundred and forty subsisting members; eleven of the thirteen voted for Farrow. February 2, 1870, on the question of the ratification of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, only seventy-one, out of one hundred and fifty-two sworn members of which the house then consisted, cast their votes, six of which were given by minority members.

The journal of the proceedings of the joint assembly of the two houses on Wednesday, February 16, shows that at 12 o'clock the senate attended in the hall of the house of representatives, and then follow the following entries: "The general assembly then proceeded to consolidate the vote of the two houses cast on yesterday for a United States Senator for the term ending March 4, 1873, and on consolidating the same it appeared that the Hon. Henry P. Farrow had received 109 votes; scattering, 2 votes." Then follows a list of the names of the senators, twenty-nine in all, and of the representatives, eighty in all, who voted for Mr. Farrow, and "scattering two," and Henry P. Farrow "was declared duly elected United States Senator for the term ending March 4, 1873."

A similar entry is made in the journal as to the election of R. H. Whiteley for the term ending March 4, 1871, except that Whiteley received 110 votes, and there was scattering 1 vote. (A copy of the journal of the house of representatives showing the proceedings in full upon the election of Farrow and Whitely in that body on the 15th, and of the joint assembly on the 16th of February, is hereto appended, marked Exhibit F.) Bradley, who had been declared ineligible by the senate in consequence of his conviction of a penitentiary offense, and had also resigned in August, 1868, without a re-election, appeared in the reorganized legislature of 1870, and voted for Farrow and Whiteley. It appears that no vote was taken in the joint assembly, as required by the act of Congress, when either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by the act; but the fact that Farrow and Whiteley had received a majority of all the votes cast in each house, on the day previous, without inquiry whether a quorum of each house was present at the time, seems to have been regarded as sufficient to perfect their election.

Of the 109 votes cast for Farrow in both houses, 16 were given by persons not embraced in the list of persons named in General Meade's proclamation as elected, but by minority candidates, who had been seated in the places of those elected by the people, and who had not qualified in the second instance as members. The names of the minority members who voted for Farrow are: Crayton, Dunning, Henderson, Mathews, Traywick, of the senate; and Guilford, Goodwin, Hutchings, Holcomb, Harris of Glascock, Johnson of Forsythe, Johnson of Spalding, Jackson, Nesbit of Gordon, Rogers, and Thomason, of the house.

Mathews did not vote for Whiteley, but Armstrong, another minority member, did, so that Farrow and Whiteley each received the votes of sixteen minority members, some of whom received less than half the number of votes cast for the majority candidate in whose place they were substituted, and all of whom, according to the unanimous report of this committee made at a former session, were admitted to seats in the legislature without authority of law. Deducting the 16 votes cast by minority members, and Farrow received in both houses the votes of ninety-three and Whiteley of ninety-four qualified members.

Deducting these sixteen minority members from the whole number, one hundred and eleven, present in the joint meeting of the general assembly, and it would leave but ninety-five present, considerably less than a "majority of all the members elected to both houses," as required by the act of Congress, but more than a majority of the persons who had qualified as members in the reorganized legislature.

The general assembly was organized in July, 1868, in prima facie accordance with the constitution of the State, the reconstruction acts of Congress, and the orders of the military department. It complied in form with all the requirements necessary to entitle the State to representation in Congress, and members were accordingly admitted into the House of Representatives of the United States in 1868. Whether either or both houses of the general assembly of Georgia admitted persons to sit as members in their respective bodies who were disqualified by the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution was at the time a disputed question; but each house appointed a committee to consider that question, after whose report it was voted by each house that all its members were qualified. These reports and the action upon the same appear in the appendix to the report made to the Senate by this committee, by Mr. Stewart, at the third session of the Fortieth Congress, and are hereto annexed, marked Exhibit G. The general assembly thus organized not only elected Senators of the United States, but it also elected, as required by the State constitution, State officers, to wit, a secretary of state, a comptroller-general, and a State treasurer, all of whom have since been discharging the duties of their respective offices without question. At the same session judges of the various courts throughout the State were appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, who have since been and are now presiding in the various courts of the State. The legislature thus organized passed laws authorizing the borrowing of money and affecting the general interests of the State, none of which have ever been held or supposed to be invalid for the reason that the legislature which enacted them was not properly organized. The reason for the passage of the act of Congress of December 22, 1869, requiring a reorganization of the general assembly is to be found in the wrongful expulsion by the general assembly in September, 1868, of its colored members, in the seating of the minority candidates in their places, and in continuing in their seats members believed to be disqualified, and in the general disorder and violence which prevailed in the State. That act did not declare the general assembly as organized in July, 1868, to have been illegal, or its acts, other than those referred to in the act itself, invalid; but it provided for correcting the wrongful and revolutionary acts which had been done by it as organized in July, 1868. It is not believed that the act of December 22, 1869, would ever have been passed had the colored members been permitted to retain their seats and the peace of the State been preserved.

The body of the general assembly as organized in July, 1868, and as reorganized in January, 1870, is not essentially different. Of the forty-four senators and one hundred and seventy-three members declared elected by General Meade, only five senators and nineteen representatives who participated in the organization of July, 1868, were excluded or failed to participate in the reorganization in January, 1870, and twenty-one minority candidates were improperly admitted to seats in the general assembly, as reorganized, in their places. The general assembly as organized in July, 1868, and at the time of the election of Hill and Miller, contained in each house a constitutional quorum of legal members. All the contestants maintained the position before the committee that the ineligibility or disqualification of individual members of either house, not sufficiently numerous to affect its constitutional quorum, was an immaterial issue. Your committee have not, therefore, deemed it necessary to discuss that question further than to state the facts in regard to it. Three of the claimants—Joshua Hill, W. P. Farrow, and R. H. Whiteley—have had their political disabilities removed by act of Congress of June 25 and July 20, 1868. H. V. M. Miller never labored under any of the political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; but it is admitted that he acted as a surgeon in the rebel army under an appointment from a colonel of a rebel regiment, and having thus given aid to persons in hostility to the United States, cannot take the oath required by the act of July 2, 1862.

The act of July 11, 1868, prescribes a qualified oath to be taken by persons elected or appointed to office from whom political disabilities have been removed. Your committee are of opinion that Joshua Hill was duly elected by a legislature having authority to elect Senators, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws. Miller, however, is not relieved from taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and in the opinion of your committee is not entitled to take his seat; and it follows from the conclusion of the committee as to the proceedings in the election of Hill and Miller that neither Farrow nor Whiteley is entitled to a seat.

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joshua Hill has been duly elected Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Georgia, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws.

I agree that Joshua Hill is entitled to take his seat; and I hold that H. V. M. Miller is entitled to take his seat on taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution.

A. G. THURMAN.

Mr. Stewart asked and obtained leave to submit the following as the views of the minority:

The undersigned, being unable to agree with the report of the majority of the committee, beg leave to submit the following:

The main question at issue is, which election shall be held valid; that of Hill and Miller, in July, 1868, or that of Farrow and Whiteley, in January, 1870? In the determination of this question much depends upon the point of time when Georgia became entitled to representation in Congress.

The ground assigned for the exclusion of Senators from the rebel States after the fall of the rebellion was that those States were not entitled to representation.

The report of the Reconstruction Committee, made at the first session of the Thirty ninth Congress, on the 8th of June, 1866, reviewed the condition of these States, and proclaimed the doctrine that further guarantees were necessary for protection, peace, and union, and that it was the duty of Congress to exercise a legislative control over the whole subject until these objects were secured, and that neither House should pass upon the election and qualifications of its members until Congress had declared the State entitled to representation.

This report has formed the basis of the reconstruction policy of Congress, both in submitting constitutional amendments and in its legislative action.

We have been able to find no case in the history of the Government where Senators have been admitted from a State not entitled to representation in Congress at the time of their election.

There are many cases in which this legislative declaration was not made until after the election of Senators. This has occurred in the admission of new States where the organization of the State and the election of Senators had occurred previous to the admission. But in those cases the act of admission was an approval of the organization that had preceded it, and amounted to a legislative declaration that the State at the time of the election of Senators was entitled to representation. In each of these cases the loyal status of the State was unquestioned, and the act of Congress admitting such State was construed to relate back to the election of Senators, and to amount to a legislative declaration that the State at the time of the election was entitled to representation. This principle cannot help the case of Hill and Miller, for at the time the declaration was made by the act of July 15, 1870, that the State of Georgia was entitled to representation, the status of things had been changed in Georgia by the reorganization of the legislature. This declaration related to the then existing condition of the State.

Congress has already in effect decided that the necessary legislative declaration that Georgia was entitled to representation was not made prior to the election of Hill and Miller. The act of December 22, 1869, "to promote the reconstruction of Georgia," can be justified upon no other theory than that reconstruction in that State was not then an accomplished fact. After a compliance with this act, and not before, we have the declaration in the act of July 15, 1870, that "it is hereby declared that the State of Georgia is entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States." If this act relates back to the date of the election of Hill and Miller, their exclusion from seats in this body from July, 1868, until now is wholly without justification, and the act of December 22, 1869, was an exercise of power over a State entitled to representation for which there is no precedent; and which, if exercised in the case of Massachusetts or Ohio, would, to say the least, be open to grave constitutional doubts. It directs the governor to convene the persons originally elected to the legislature, and requires those persons, as a qualification for seats in that body, to take and subscribe to an oath hitherto unknown to the laws of the State of Georgia or of the United States; and it also required them to reorganize the legislature by electing officers, who shall also be required to take the same oath. It requires the legislature to ratify the fifteenth amendment before Senators and Representatives shall be admitted to seats in Congress, and prescribes various other matters, all pertaining to the reconstruction of a rebel State, and never applied to a loyal State whose practical relations to the Union were not disturbed. We venture to affirm that the Senate and House of Representatives in voting for that act did so upon the theory that they were reconstructing a rebel State, and not upon the theory that they were dealing with a State whose practical relations with the United States had never been disturbed, or which, having been disturbed, were then fully restored. It seems clear that the requirement alone that the legislature should ratify the fifteenth amendment before Senators and Representatives should be admitted from Georgia was in itself a declaration that Georgia was not on the 22d of December, 1869, entitled to representation. But after the reorganization of the legislature under this act, the whole matter was again submitted to Congress, and Congress accepted the State as then organized. The act of July 15, 1870, was a legislative declaration that the State was then entitled to representation under the organization of the legislature as then existing, and related back to the commencement of the then existing state of things, namely, the reorganization of the legislature in January, 1870. This was a declaration that Georgia was entitled to representation at the time of the election of Farrow and Whiteley.

The language of the act of July, 1870, is "that the State of Georgia, having complied with the reconstruction acts, and the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendments to the Constitution of the United States having been ratified in good faith by a legal legislature of said State, it is hereby declared that the State of Georgia is entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States."

How can it be claimed that this language refers to the organization in 1868, in view of the facts in this case? Had the State of Georgia complied with the reconstruction acts at that date?

If this be so, Congress stultified itself in passing the act of the 22d of December, 1869, to promote the reconstruction of Georgia, eighteen months after she had fully complied with the reconstruction acts under which the other States were admitted.

It seems clear that this language embraced all the reconstruction laws with which Georgia was required to comply, including the act of December, 1869. It is evident that Congress intended to declare, and did declare, that after the compliance with the last-named act, and not before, Georgia was entitled to representation.

It is too late to question the propriety of these acts by either House acting separately upon the credentials of its members, for it is too well established that Congress must determine when a State is entitled to representation. After that determination has been made, neither House, acting alone, can question its validity, but each House is confined, in passing upon the credentials of its members, to matters of election and qualification.

We have shown that Hill and Miller were not elected from a State which, at the time, was entitled to representation by any act of Congress, from which it follows that they are not entitled to seats in the Senate.

We have also shown that Farrow and Whiteley were elected by a legislature of a State which Congress recognized as duly organized by declaring the State entitled to representation.

The election of these gentlemen seems to have been regular and a substantial compliance with law, and we therefore conclude that they are entitled to their seats.

We might stop here, resting the whole case on these acts of Congress, but it seems proper to embody in these views a more full history of the transaction.

The credentials of Mr. Hill were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at the third session of the Fortieth Congress, and that committee, after a careful examination of the whole case, submitted a report, which, for convenience of reference, is hereto appended.

The committee which made this report was composed of Messrs. Trumbull, Stewart, Frelinghuysen, Edmunds, Conkling, Rice, and Hendricks. The report was made by Mr. Stewart, and concurred in by Messrs. Edmunds and Rice. Mr. Conkling concurred in the conclusion, and agreed that the report be made. Mr. Frelinghuysen signed the report with a further qualification, using the word "now," which, it must be admitted, makes it difficult to determine what he really meant.

Four of the committee, however, constituting a majority, concurred in the conclusion of the report.

We call especial attention to that conclusion, which is in the following significant language:

"Wherefore your committee feel called upon to recommend that Mr. Hill be not allowed to take his seat in the Senate for the reason that Georgia is not entitled to representation in Congress."

The four Senators who arrived at this conclusion are still members of the Senate and of the Judiciary Committee, and constitute a majority of that committee.

If Georgia was not entitled to representation, by what authority did she elect Senators? The right of representation cannot exist in a State without the right to elect persons to represent such State. The converse of this proposition seems equally true, that where the right of representation does not exist there can be no right of election.

A point is made on the following language in the report of the committee made by Mr. Edmunds at the last session:

"It has been seen that the legislature, as originally elected and organized in 1868, was not a 'provisional' legislature within the purview of the acts of reconstruction, but that it was a State legislature authorized by Congress to be elected and assembled, but not having absolute legislative power until the admission of the State to representation."

We are unable to see clearly the distinction between a provisional legislature and a State legislature not having absolute legislative power. This seems to be a controversy about terms, not substance. The fact that Congress continued its legislative control is conclusive as to the status of the State, and the fact that Congress recognized and confirmed certain acts done by the legislature of Georgia is answered by the further fact that Congress also refused to sanction many other important acts of that same legislature. It refused to sanction the receiving and retaining of a large number of disqualified persons under the proposed fourteenth amendment. It refused to sanction the act of that legislature in expelling the colored members. It even refused to sanction the authority of the legislature, as then organized, to elect its own officers, and required an organization to be commenced de novo.

Notwithstanding all this it is maintained that this State, which was not entitled to representation, whose legislature had no power to elect a clerk or sergeant-at-arms, was clothed with all necessary power to elect a Senator of the United States.

Our opinion is that there was no legal organization of the legislature, by reason of a refusal to comply with the act of June, 1868, which says: * * * "But no person prohibited from holding office under the United States, or any State, by section 3 of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article 14, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, unless relieved from disability, as provided in said amendment."

But it is said that whether the legislature did admit and retain disqualified persons is a disputed question. We never saw any reason for disputing that fact, nor the fact that it was done knowingly and willfully.

It seems, however, that if any doubt ever existed on that question, that the fact that on the reorganization a large number were either excluded or failed to qualify has settled all reasonable doubts. Who can doubt that of the large number who failed to qualify under the reorganization there were many ineligible persons?

But we will not differ about terms in this controversy. It may be called a State legislature without absolute power of legislation, a provisional legislature, or an illegally organized legislature.

We have shown that it did not have all the power of the legislature of a State whose practical relations with the Union were intact, but on the contrary that Congress continued to legislate to promote the reconstruction of Georgia long after the election of Hill and Miller, with the declared purpose of restoring the practical relations of that State to the Union. It is true that this legislature was not in existence at the time of the passage of the original reconstruction acts, and probably was not one of the provisional governments referred to in those acts. Nevertheless, Congress continued its legislative authority over the State, and practically treated the government therein as provisional. The fact that it was organized under the new constitution of Georgia did not of itself deprive it of its provisional character. It did not cease to be provisional until Congress declared the State entitled to representation. All the provisional governments in the South were organized under State constitutions, but Congress refused to regard them as legal State governments, and subjected them to the paramount authority of the United States. When the credentials of Mr. Hill were before this committee on a former occasion, the position taken by the report submitted to the Senate was that the legislature had failed to comply with the act of Congress providing for its organization, and that the existence of any legislature authorized to act as such was the issue involved.

They say: "For the purposes of this report, however, your committee did not deem it necessary to ascertain the number of disqualified persons admitted. But the fact that any were knowingly admitted was not only a violation of the fourteenth amendment, and a failure to comply with the requirements of Congress, but manifests a disposition to disobey and defy the authority of the United States. If one could be admitted why not all? And will it be contended that if the entire body had been composed of men who had usurped the functions of the legislature against the express provisions of the reconstruction acts, they could have complied with the provisions of those acts so as to create any obligation on the part of Congress to receive their Senators and Representatives?

* * * * * * *

"It is quite probable that Mr. Hill received votes of persons who were not qualified to hold seats in the legislature more than sufficient to constitute his majority and secure his election, but your committee do not propose to investigate that question. The election and qualification of members of the legislature where the existence of any legislature authorized to act as such is not involved cannot be inquired into by the Senate in determining the right of a Senator to his seat. Your committee hold that the question involved in this case is not whether persons not entitled to seats in the legislature were received by that body and allowed to vote upon the election of a Senator, but whether the body assuming to be the legislature violated the conditions upon which it was allowed to organize by permitting disloyal persons to participate in its proceedings. It may be contended that although the matters hereinbefore set forth constitute a failure on the part of the State of Georgia to comply in every respect with the reconstruction acts, yet Congress ought to waive these slight departures and admit their representatives. But an examination into the subsequent proceedings of the legislature of Georgia, and the disorganized condition of society in that State, leads your committee to the conclusion that all these violations of law were in pursuance of a common purpose to evade the law and resist the authority of the United States."

It is now contended that the Senate should waive the rebellious acts of this pretended legislature and accept the Senators it elected while it was knowingly and willfully defying the authority of the United States; and this, too, after Congress in its legislative capacity has, in effect, declared this organization illegal by ordering a reorganization to be made. So radical had been the legislation of Congress in respect to Georgia that it was deemed necessary in the act admitting the State, passed on the 15th of July last, to expressly ratify certain things that had been done to avoid the conclusion that Congress intended to annul all the acts of this pretended State government. The language of that law is as follows:

"But nothing in this act contained shall be construed to deprive the people of Georgia of the right to an election for members of the general assembly of said State, as provided for in the constitution thereof; and nothing in this or any other act of Congress shall be construed to affect the term to which any officer has been appointed or any member of the general assembly elected as prescribed by the constitution of the State of Georgia."

Why say that this act should not deprive the people of Georgia of an election under their constitution at the time fixed therein, if the act itself was an approval of what they had done and related back to the organization of the State? Why say that nothing in this or any other act of Congress shall affect the term to which any officer has been appointed, or any member of the general assembly elected, if the act itself was to be construed to relate back to the first organization and amount to a legislative declaration that Congress approved of that organization? The fact is, that these acts of Congress had treated the State as not yet fully reconstructed, and it was thought necessary to expressly approve certain important matters, to the end that it might not be claimed that they were disapproved.

If Congress had intended to approve of the election of Senators, it seems natural that such intention should have appeared in the list of those things which were not to be affected or disturbed.

It is suggested that there is some doubt about the regularity of the election of Mr. Farrow, for the reason that there was no quorum present in the house of representatives at the time of his election. The records show that the house, when reorganized and disloyal members excluded, consisted of one hundred and fifty-four members, and Mr. Farrow alleges that one member, Robert Lumpkin, who had been sworn in, died before the Senatorial election, leaving the number one hundred and fifty-three. A quorum of this number would be seventy-seven. The number of persons present and voting was eighty-two, of which Mr. Farrow received eighty. But it is said that minority men were improperly admitted. We might answer this by saying they were admitted by the legislature, and that the Senate will not ordinarily review the action of that body in deciding upon the qualification of its own members.

But if the Senate would enter upon such an investigation under any circumstances (which on mature reflection we now think may be open to some doubt) it cannot be called upon to do so in this case. The question of the proper organization of the legislature in January, 1870, was, at the last session, under investigation in both Houses, on the passage of the act of July 15, 1870. The report of the Judiciary Committee of the 2d of March last, printed as a part of the majority report, recommends that no further legislation be had to perfect the organization of the legislature of Georgia as it then existed, and Congress, acting on that report, decided it to be a legal legislature.

But admitting that the minority men were improperly received, the result would be the same.

The number of members declared elected in General Meade's order, who were allowed to qualify and retain their seats, leaving out of the calculation those who are known as "minority men," was one hundred and forty-one.

Deducting Mr. Lumpkin, who is alleged to have died before the Senatorial election, and we have one hundred and forty. Necessary to a quorum, seventy-one. Number of persons present and voting on the election of Mr. Farrow, seventy-one. Of this number Mr. Farrow received sixty-nine. Thus it appears in either case a quorum was present, and Mr. Farrow had a majority of that quorum.

All other matters in regard to the election of Messrs. Farrow and Whiteley, we believe, are admitted to have been regular.

We therefore recommend for adoption a resolution declaring Henry P. Farrow and Richard H. Whiteley elected, and entitled to seats in the Senate on taking the oaths required by law.

WM. M. STEWART.
B. F. RICE.

The following is the resolution proposed:

Resolved, That Henry P. Farrow and Richard H. Whiteley are entitled to take their seats in the Senate, upon taking the oath prescribed by law.

MONDAY, January 30, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that Joshua Hill has been duly elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Georgia, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws, it was determined in the affirmative; and the Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution.

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Stewart to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the words,

"That Henry P. Farrow and Richard H. Whiteley are entitled to take their seats in the Senate, upon taking the oath prescribed by law,"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 36.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Abbott, Ames, Boreman, Brownlow, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Stearns, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Blair, Buckingham, Carpenter, Casserly, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Fowler, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnston, Kellogg, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Ross, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Warner, Willey, and Williams.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

On motion by Mr. Stewart to amend the resolution by striking out the name "Joshua Hill" and inserting the name "Henry P. Farrow,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Chandler (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on page 816 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 3d sess. 41st Cong., and on pages 817–830 in part 2 of the same.]

TUESDAY, January 31, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Joshua Hill duly elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Georgia and entitled to take his seat in the Senate upon taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws; and Pending debate thereon, the following message was received, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 848–851 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 3d sess. 41st Cong.]

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1871.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That H. V. M. Miller has been duly elected a Senator by the legislature of Georgia, for the term ending March 4, 1871."

Mr. Stewart submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Richard H. Whiteley is entitled to take his seat in the Senate upon taking the oath prescribed by law."

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring Joshua Hill to be duly elected a Senator of the United States, and entitled to take his seat upon taking the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws; and the question being upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Stewart, to strike out the name "Joshua Hill" and insert the name "Henry P. Farrow,"

After debate, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 37.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Abbott, Ames, Boreman, Brownlow, Chandler, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Stearns, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Blair, Buckingham, Carpenter, Casserly, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Fowler, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Johnston, Kellogg, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Warner, Willey, and Williams.

So the amendment of Mr. Stewart was not agreed to; and

On the question to agree to the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was

Resolved, That Joshua Hill has been duly elected Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Georgia, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws.

Whereupon

Mr. Hill apppeared, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Vice-President, hetook his seat in the Senate.

[The debate is found on pages 871–874 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, 3d sess. 41st Cong.]

FRIDAY, February 24, 1871.

The Vice-President stated that the message of the President of the United States, just received, announced that he had approved and signed the "Joint resolution * prescribing the oath to be taken by H. V. M. Miller, Senator-elect from the State of Georgia," and requested Mr. Miller, Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, whose credentials were presented on the 11th day of January, 1869, to come forward and take the oath of office.

Whereupon

Mr. Miller appeared, and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the Vice-President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

COMPENSATION OF SENATORS AND CONTESTANTS.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1871.

Mr. Trumbull submitted the following resolution; which was read, and passed to a second reading:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Georgia the compensation allowed by law, from the 29th day of July, 1868; and to H. P. Farrow and Richard H. Whiteley, contestants from the State of Georgia, compensation from the 16th day of February, 1870, the date of their election by the reorganized legislature of Georgia, to 30th day of January, 1871, when the Senate decided they were not entitled to seats."

MONDAY, February 27, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 25th instant, directing the Secretary of the Senate to pay the Senators from the State of Georgia; and the resolution was agreed to.

* The proceedings of the Senate relating to this joint resolution are omitted

[Forty-first Congress—Second session.]

H. R. REVELS,

Senator from Mississippi from February 25, 1870, till March 3, 1871.

February 23, 1870, the credentials of Mr. Revels were presented. A resolution was submitted that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to inquire whether he had been nine years a citizen of the United States, and whether the person certifying to his election was the governor of the State. Mr. Revels's credentials were signed by Adelbert Ames, brevet major-general United States Army, provisional governor of Mississippi. The act of July 25, 1866, provided "that it shall be the duty of the governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen as aforesaid to certify his election" &c. It was contended that this was not such a certificate as was required by that act. It was also contended that Mr. Revels, being partly of African blood, had not been nine years a citizen of the United States; that he was not a citizen at birth, following the decision of the Dred Scott case; that he became a citizen only on the ratification of the fourteenth amendment in 1868. After debate, the motion to refer the credentials was determined in the negative, and Mr. Revels took the oath of office February 25. Extracts from remarks given below will show the grounds upon which certain Senators proceeded.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 2d sess. 41st Cong., with extracts from remarks of Messrs. Vickers and Scott.

Special references to the debates of each day, which are found in the Congressional Globe, part 2, 2d sess. 41st Cong., are inserted below.

WEDNESDAY, February 23, 1870.

Mr. Wilson presented the credentials of H. R. Revels, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Mississippi for the unexpired portion of the term ending March 4, 1871; which were read.

Mr. Wilson presented a certified extract from the proceedings of the house of representatives of the State of Mississippi, also a certified extract from the proceedings of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Mississippi, relative to the election of H. R. Revels as a Senator in Congress; which were read.

Mr. Saulsbury objected to the reception of the credentials; and After debate, the Vice-President submitted the question to the Senate: Shall the credentials be received? It was determined in the affirmative.

Whereupon

Mr. Stockton submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the credentials of Hiram R. Revels, who is now claiming a seat in this body as a Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are hereby requested to inquire and report whether he has been a citizen of the United States for the period of nine years, and was an inhabitant of the said State at the time of his alleged election in the sense intended by the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and whether Adelbert Ames, brevet major-general and provisional governor of Mississippi, as appears by the credentials, was the governor of the State of Mississippi at the time, and whether he was an inhabitant of the said State."

On the question to agree to the resolution of Mr. Stockton,

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Thayer (at 5 o'clock), the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 1503–1514 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

THURSDAY, February 24, 1870.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to refer the credentials of H. R. Revels, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Mississippi for the unexpired portion of the term ending March 4, 1871, with certain instructions; and

After debate, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 1542–1544 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. Mr. Saulsbury's speech is found on pages 125–130 of the Congressional Globe, part 7, Appendix, 2d sess. 41st Cong.]

FRIDAY, February 25, 1870.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. Stockton to refer the credentials of H. R. Revels, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Mississippi for the unexpired portion of the term ending March 4, 1871, to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire and report whether he has been a citizen of the United States for the period of nine years, and was an inhabitant of the said State at the time of his alleged election in the sense intended by the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States; and whether Adelbert Ames, brevet major-general and provisional governor of Mississippi, as appears by the credentials, was the governor of the State of Mississippi at the time, and whether he was an inhabitant of the said State; and After debate, on the question to agree to the motion, it was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 48.

On motion by Mr. Pomeroy, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bayard, Casserly, Davis, Hamilton, McCreery, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Vickers.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Fenton, Ferry, Fowler, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Howell, Kellogg, Lewis, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Willey, Williams, and Wilson.

So the motion was not agreed to.

On motion by Mr. Wilson, that the oaths prescribed by law be now administered to Mr. Revels, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 8.

On motion by Mr. Pomeroy, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Fenton, Ferry, Fowler, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Howell, Kellogg, Lewis, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Willey, Williams, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Casserly, Davis, Hamilton, McCreery, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Vickers.

So the motion was agreed to; and

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Revels by the Vice-President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Vickers, of Maryland, in support of the resolution submitted by Mr. Stockton. Delivered in the Senate February 25, 1870, and found on pages 1557, 1558, and 1560 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"The subject before the Senate is one which relates to the eligibility of an individual elected to this body. That question involves the three qualifications which the Constitution of the country requires of persons before they can take a seat in this Assembly: the first, that they shall have been citizens of the United States for nine years; secondly, that they shall be inhabitants of the State from which they are elected; and thirdly, that they shall be of the age of thirty years.

"Now, the question of reference to the Committee on the Judiciary includes all three inquiries, whether this party is thirty years of age, is a legal inhabitant of the State of Mississippi, and has been a citizen of the United States for nine consecutive years. I do not propose to dwell upon any of these propositions except the one of citizenship; and the question for the Senate to consider is whether he has been a citizen of the United States for nine years. That is the point which I wish to present to and impress upon the judgment of the Senate.

"I shall rely mainly on the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Scott vs. Sandford, which has been referred to, and upon the opinion delivered by Chief-Justice Taney on behalf of a large majority of that court.

"I know that decision has been denounced not only in the Senate but in the country, but it stands unrepealed, and is the adjudicated law of the land. Chief-Justice Taney was in social life one of the most exemplary of men. His private character was pure and unsullied. He was honest, just, and faithful. He performed all the duties of private, social, and public life with that fidelity and correctness which we should expect from a man so virtuous and exalted. There has never been a blemish upon his private or his public life. I believe, although I am not fully qualified to say, that he was not a slaveholder. I think he was not, and I am sure that I am justisfied in saying that after he was placed upon the bench he separated himself from the politics of the country and never exercised the right of suffrage. His ambition was to make an upright, able, and impartial judge, and he entered and left public office with as clean hands as any man that ever lived in this country. He entered it poor and he left it in the same condition, and bequeathed as a heritage to his family a high, pure, and exalted reputation.

"So much for the character of the judge. Now, what was that opinion? It was upon a case which involved the citizenship of a suitor in the courts of the United States. The Constitution gave jurisdiction to those courts between parties who are citizens of different States. The very question presented to the consideration of the court was whether the parties plaintiff, Dred Scott and others, were citizens of the United States within the constitutional intendment. To show that the court desired nothing but impartial justice, the case was ably argued twice at different terms, in order that the most thorough examination, discussion, and deliberation might be had on a matter of such magnitude. And what, under the circumstances, was the duty of the court? It was to decide whether the parties plaintiff were citizens according to the Constitution. That was incumbent upon them, and there was no alternative. This necessarily brought up to the attention and consideration of the court the condition of the parties. They were of African descent, and the question naturally arose, and it was so argued, are they citizens of the United States and qualified to sue in its courts? A large majority of the court decided that they were not citizens of the United States.

"I did not suppose that any one would have found fault with the court for the performance of this duty. They were bound to decide according to their convictions; but the complaint was, as was stated by the Senator from Delaware yesterday, that they departed from this question and went into an argument upon the condition of this class of people and the right of masters to take them into the Territories of the United States. We all know that there was great excitement in the country at that period in reference to the constitutional right of a master to take his slaves north of the Missouri line of 36° 30′. Some of these parties had been taken by their owners north of the Missouri line into what was called free territory, and this fact necessarily brought to the consideration and examination of the court the question whether the owner of a slave had a right to take him into a Territory of the United States.

"That decision, I know, has been animadverted upon here as it has been elsewhere. But have not other decisions been condemned? Was not that upon the fugitive slave law severely criticised in the country, and probably in Congress, too, by the Freesoilers? The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] said in reference to it that he did not feel bound to sustain that law after the Supreme Court had decided in favor of its constitutionality; and yet that decision was made by a unanimous court. There was perfect unanimity upon the question of its constitutionality.

"But I have waited with anxiety to hear a refutation of any single position which the Supreme Court took in the decision of the Dred Scott case. I know it is easy to censure a decision and get up a political clamor against it, but I want to know if any single position of fact or of law which that court announced has ever been successfully controverted. I have not heard it attempted in the Senate of the United States. I have not heard a single argument against the correctness of the legal positions or to any statement of fact asserted by the court.

"And now, when a case has been so solemnly adjudicated by a court forming one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, and whose duty it is to determine grave constitutional questions, I ask if any reason can be assigned against the decision of that case or any of the principles involved in it? Denunciation should be disregarded by an intelligent people while the principles of the opinion stand unassailed and irrefragable.

"What were some of the propositions of law decided by that tribunal?

"1. That when the Constitution was adopted persons of African descent were not regarded in any of the States as members of the community which constituted the States, and were not numbered among its people or citizens; consequently, the special rights and immunities guaranteed to citizens did not apply to them.

"2. That no State could by any subsequent law make a foreigner or any other description of persons citizens of the United States.

"3. That a State might by its laws put a foreigner, or any other description of persons, upon a footing with its own citizens; but that would not make him a citizen of the United States, nor entitle him to sue in its courts, nor to any of the privileges and immunities of a citizen in another State.

"The disqualification of the African race was as radical, fundamental, and perfect as language could make it. This is by a co-ordinate department of the Government, existing by the same Constitution as Congress; in its origin, design, and objects as thoroughly constitutional; in its powers and jurisdiction superior, because State and national legislation is measured and limited by the Constitution according to its judgment. Its decisions and decrees are as binding as the Constitution itself."

* * * * * * *

"I suppose there is not a Senator on this floor who voted either for the civil rights bill or for the submission of the constitutional amendment to the States but what believed it was absolutely necessary and indispensable to make these people citizens of the United States; without the passage of that bill in the opinion of some, and without the passage and adoption of the constitutional amendment in the opinion of others, they would not have been citizens of the United States. After the civil rights bill was passed and when it passed there were serious objections to it. It was doubtful in the minds of many whether grants by legislative enactment could make a citizen of the Un. ed States; whether it did not require a constitutional amendment to make them such; and the better opinion was that it did require it, because by the Constitution they were not made citizens. You proceeded on the very ground that it was absolutely requisite that the amendment should be made which made the party now claiming his seat a citizen of the United States from the time of its approval only; from that time he became a citizen; and as nine years have not elapsed, how can we, upon our oaths and in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court, the practice of the Government, the decisions of all the State courts, the opinions of the Attorneys-General, say that in our opinion he was a citizen of the United States before the passage of the civil rights bill or of the fourteenth constitutional amendment?

"This is not a political but a judicial question, and ought to be decided by us as judges and not as politicians. In the Dred Scott case the Supreme Court said—

"'That, looking to the contemporaneous history and to the contemporaneous legislation of the several States at the time the Constitution was adopted, the use of the word "citizen," as employed in that Constitution, was to exclude the African and every race but the white.'

"The court looked into the construction of this provision. They took a deliberate view of the contemporaneous history of the States and the condition of the country at the time. This was proper and necessary to a full understanding of the subject. In a debate which took place in the Senate of the United States on the 7th of February, 1866, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] assumed the ground that no State had a republican government that tolerated slavery; and it was in reference to that that the late Mr. Fessenden, who was so distinguished in this body, as he was in every public station which he occupied, said in reply:

"'I ask the question that he may answer it, because after all he will admit, as a lawyer, as we all must, that in construing a constitution, and construing a statute, and construing any provision, we look at contemporaneous history in the first place, and we look more particularly, when endeavoring to find out what the sense of an instrument is, at all its clauses in order to get the meaning of all, for one explains the other. It would seem to me that the Senator went a little too far with his argument as to the guarantee clause.'

"The opinion of Mr. Fessenden was that in construing the Constitution we must look at the contemporaneous history of the country. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] said yesterday that the decision in the Dred Scott case applied only to persons of African descent whose ancestors had been sold into slavery. Now, I ask how came that race among us? Is it not a historical fact that they were brought here and sold; that they were made articles of traffic; that they did not come here of their own accord; and that from those people have descended the whole of that class of population among us? They were denied naturalization. In the States where slavery existed the courts held that color, whether of the dark, mulatto, or mixed, was presumptive evidence of slavery, and the onus of proving emancipation or freedom rested upon the person. The courts of the United States always follow the decisions of State courts in matters local or affecting the relations or peculiar interests existing in them. If this subject shall be referred to a committee, there will be no difficulty in proving the race to which the claimant belongs, if appearances should not satisfy the most fastidious. The colonists coming from the bosom of Europe necessarily brought with them, to some extent, the feelings and sentiments of the nations toward this class of persons. The court, in reviewing the facts and the history of the condition of this people in the case alluded to, said that they did not migrate to America; and—

"'It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken.

"'They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit. He was bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise and traffic whenever a profit could be made by it. This opinion was at that time fixed and universal in the civilized portion of the white race.'"

[Extract from remarks of Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, in opposition to the resolution submitted by Mr. Stockton. Delivered in the Senate February 25, 1870, and found on page 1565 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

"The proposal is to refer his credentials to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of making inquiry as to whether he has been a citizen of the United States for nine years. It is admitted that he is a citizen now, and therefore he is admissible as a Senator unless there be some disqualification. What is that disqualification? It is alleged that he is a man of color, and that therefore he was not a citizen prior to the enactment of the civil rights bill. Now, sir, no one stands here to question that his citizenship was an open question before the adoption of the civil rights bill. The history of the litigation that had occurred in various States, and that finally got into the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case, is enough to show that a question was made as to whether a colored man was or was not a citizen of the United States. The decisions in Kentucky, the decisions in Connecticut, the decisions in my own State, the discussion which took place upon the admission of Missouri into the Union, the Dred Scott case, the universal discussion of this question at one period in our history—these are enough to show that the public mind was not settled upon the question. But if it was not settled then, could it be more effectively settled than it has been, first by the passage of the civil rights bill, and then, if that was not sufficent as a mere act of Congress to determine the status of citizenship in the face of a decision of the Supreme Court, surely it will not be contended that the fourteenth constitutional amendment, declaring that all persons born within the United States are citizens, is not sufficient to settle it.

"The civil rights bill, if its text be turned to, and the fourteenth amendment, if its text be turned to, will be found to be both declaratory. They do not enact that 'from henceforth all persons born within the United States shall be citizens,' but the present tense is used in both: 'all persons' 'are citizens of the United States.' If that be sufficient to settle the question, if that be enough as a declaratory law to declare that all persons born within the limits of the United States are citizens of the United States, where does this man stand who now presents himself as Senator-elect from Mississippi?

"It is urged by gentlemen on the other side that he became a citizen only by virtue of one or the other of these enactments; but if they turn to the history of that clause of the Constitution of the United States on which they rely they will find that it was inserted both in reference to Senators and to Representatives in the other House of Congress, and also in reference to the President, because of the apprehension that was felt of foreign influences in our Government. In the discussion which occurred in the convention—I have it here, but will not take the time of the Senate to read it—on fixing the qualifications of Senators it was especially dwelt upon that the Senate being the body which was to pass upon treaties with foreign governments, it was particularly necessary that the period of citizenship should be extended and made longer for a Senator than for a member of the House of Representatives. The discussion of Mr. Madison in the Federalist of this clause shows that the purpose, the reason, the intention of this clause in the Constitution of the United States was that persons who had been born abroad should not be permitted to become Senators until after they had been citizens a certain length of time. That is the reason, that is the spirit of the law; and it is a maxim which I need not quote, that the reason ceasing the law ceases with it.

"Here, then, is a man born in the United States, not an alien, not a foreigner, who comes here elected by a State legislature. No question is raised as to his qualification as to age; no question is raised as to his qualification in any other respect than as to whether he has been a citizen of the United States for nine years. Now, even if the doctrine contended for by the gentlemen on the other side were true, that he was not a citizen until the time of the passage of the civil rights bill or until the adoption of the fourteenth constitutional amendment, still he is not within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which requires a man to be a citizen for nine years. The meaning, the spirit of that was, that no man should occupy this place who had been naturalized as a foreigner until nine years had elapsed after his naturalization."

[Forty-first Congress--Second session.]

ADELBERT AMES,

Senator from Mississippi from April 1, 1870, till he resigned in 1874.

January 18, 1870, Mr. Ames was elected to fill the vacancy in the term beginning March 4, 1869. February 25, 1870, the credentials were presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. March 18, the committee reported the following facts: Mr. Ames was born in Maine, in 1835, where he resided with his parents until 1856, when he entered West Point. Continuing in the military service, he was ordered to Mississippi in 1868. June 15, of that year he became provisional governor by appointment of General McDowell, then district commander, and in March, 1869, he became himself district commander by assignment of the President. These two positions Mr. Ames was holding at the time of the election. Mr. Ames testified that shortly before the election, being then in Mississippi, he determined to be a candidate and decided to remain and reside in Mississippi, and publicly declared that intention. After his election he resigned his commission. This, he states, was after the passage (February 17, 1870), but before the approval (February 23, 1870) of the bill declaring Mississippi entitled to representation in Congress. Mr. Ames's parents had continued to live in Maine until 1862, and some of his papers and effects remained at his father's house. In 1862 his parents removed to Minnesota, carrying with them the effects of their son in their possession. In subsequent years Mr. Ames occasionally visited Maine, but owned no land there and occupied no habitation there of his own. The committee reported that Mr. Ames was not, when elected, an inhabitant of that State for which he was chosen, within the meaning of the third clause of the third section of the first article of the Constitution. They reported the resolution "that Adelbert Ames is not eligible to the seat in the Senate of the United States to which he had been appointed." After long debate the Senate resolved, April 1, 1870, that he was eligible to the seat, and he took the oath of office.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 2d sess. 41st Cong., and the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 41st Cong., No. 75.

Special references to the debates of each day, which are found in the Congressional Globe, part 3, 2d sess. 41st Cong., are inserted below.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1870.

Mr. Robertson presented the credentials of Adelbert Ames, elected a Senator in Congress by the legislature of the State of Mississippi for the unexpired portion of the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1869; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRIDAY, March 18, 1870.

Mr. Conkling, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Adelbert Ames, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Mississippi for the unexpired term ending the 4th day of March, 1875, submitted a report (No. 75) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution. [Resolution found at end of report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs Trumbull (chairman), Stewart, Edmunds, Conkling, Rice, Carpenter, and Thurman.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 18, 1870.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Conkling, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Adelbert Ames, claiming to be Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, report the following facts and conclusions:

Mr. Ames was born in Maine in 1835, and resided with his parents in that State until 1856, when he entered the Military Academy at West Point. From 1856 he remained in the military service of the United States until he resigned his commission, which he states was after the passage, but before the approval by the President, of the bill finally declaring Mississippi entitled to representation in Congress.

Until 1862 his parents continued to reside in Maine, and such articles and papers of his as would naturally be kept at his home remained at his father's house. In 1862 his parents removed to Minnesota, carrying with them the effects of their son in their possession, and in subsequent years he occasionally revisited Maine, but owned no land and occupied no habitation there of his own.

In 1868 he was ordered to Mississippi; on the 15th of June in that year he became provisional governor by appointment of General McDowell, then district commander, and in March, 1869, he became himself district commander by assignment of the President of the United States. These relations continued modified, if modified at all, only as will presently appear.

The election seems to have been regular, and waiving any criticism of the form of the certificate, no question has been made touching the right of Mr. Ames to take his seat, except in regard to the legal character of his residence in Mississippi.

The provision of the Constitution of the United States under which the question arises is this:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

It will be seen that to be eligible as a Senator of the United States, a person, in addition to other qualifications, must be an inhabitant of the State for which he is chosen, and he must be such an inhabitant "when elected."

The election in this instance occurred on the 18th day of January, 1870.

At this time Mr. Ames was a military officer, stationed in Mississippi by order of superior military authority, and acting as provisional governor by appointment from General McDowell, as already stated. His presence in these two characters comprises everything bearing upon the question of his residence in Mississippi down to the time when he became a candidate for the Senate. The precise date cannot be fixed, but not long before the election General Ames determined to allow his name to be submitted to the legislature as one of those from which the choice of Senators might be made.

Having reached this determination, and in connection with it, General Ames declared, as far as he did declare it, his intention in regard to his future residence. His language as delivered to the committee touching his declarations and acts is as follows:

"Upon the success of the Republican ticket in Mississippi I was repeatedly approached to become a candidate for the United States Senate. For a long time I declined—I wrote letters declining. A number of persons in Mississippi visited this city to find arguments by which I might be influenced to become a candidate. I hesitated because it would necessitate the abandonment of my whole military life. Finally, for personal and public reasons, I decided to become a candidate and leave the Army. My intentions were publicly declared and sincere. (The intentions thus declared were not only to become a candidate for the Senate, but to remain and reside in Mississippi.) I even made arrangements, almost final and permanent, with a person to manage property I intended to buy. This was before I left Mississippi. My resignation was accepted by the President before he signed the bill to admit the State."

The conclusion of the committee upon these facts is that General Ames was not, when elected, an inhabitant of the State for which he was chosen, and that he is not entitled to take his seat.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Adelbert Ames is not eligible to the seat in the Senate of the United States to which he has been appointed.

MONDAY, March 21, 1870.

[A motion was made by Mr. Morton that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the committee. After debate, the motion was withdrawn. The debate is found on pages 2087, 2088 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. This motion does not appear in the Senate Journal.]

TUESDAY, March 22, 1870.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by Mr. Conkling from the Committee on the Judiciary on the credentials of Adelbert Ames, claiming to be a Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, viz:

"Resolved, That Adelbert Ames is not eligible to the seat in the Senate of the United States to which he has been appointed."

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Hamlin, the Senate adjourned.

[The debate is found on pages 2122, 2123, 2125–2135 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

The Senate resumed, &c., and WEDNESDAY, March 23, 1870.

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Thurman (at five minutes before 5 o'clock p. m.) that the Senate adjourn, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 25.

[The debate is found on pages 2156–2169 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

MONDAY, March 28, 1870.

The Senate resumed, &c.
[No debate took place.]

TUESDAY, March 29, 1870.

The Senate resumed, &c.
[No debate took place.]

WEDNESDAY, March 30, 1870.

The Senate resumed, &c.
[No debate took place.]

THURSDAY, March 31, 1870.

The Senate resumed, &c.
Pending debate thereon,
Mr. Morrill, of Maine, presented a resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of Mississippi to facilitate the admission of Adelbert Ames to a seat in the Senate of the United States; which was read.
Ordered, That it lie on the table.
After further debate,
On motion by Mr. Hamlin (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the Senate adjourned.
[The debate is found on pages 2303–2316 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.

FRIDAY, April 1, 1870.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, on the credentials of Adelbert Ames, claiming to be a Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, viz:
"Resolved, That Adelbert Ames is not eligible to the seat in the Senate of the United States to which he has been appointed."
After debate,
On motion by Mr. Sumner to amend the resolution by striking out the word "not,"
After further debate,
On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Sumner, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 40, nays 12.
On motion by Mr. Pomeroy, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Abbott, Brownlow, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Fenton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harris, Howard, Howe, Howell, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Revels, Rice, Ross, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Warner, Williams, and Wilson.
Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Carpenter, Casserly, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, McCreery, Norton, Pratt, Schurz, Trumbull, and Vickers.
So the amendment was agreed to; and,
On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it was determined in the affirmative.
So it was
Resolved, That Adelbert Ames is eligible to the seat in the Senate of the United States to which he has been appointed.
And thereupon the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Ames by the Vice-President, and he took his seat in the Senate.
Mr. Drake submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:
"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay the Senators from the State of Mississippi the compensation allowed by law, from the 23d day of February, 1870, and the Senators from the State of Texas from the 30th day of March, 1870, the dates of the acts declaring said States, respectively, entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States."
After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.
[The debate is found on pages 2335–2349 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

[Forty-first Congress—Second session.]

OSSIAN B. HART vs. ABIJAH GILBERT, of Florida.

April 1, 1870, the petition of Mr. Hart, claiming to be entitled to a seat in the Senate for the term beginning March 4, 1869, and held by Abijah Gilbert, was presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The facts in regard to the elections were as follows: Florida had been without representation in Congress from 1861 to 1868. After the passage of the reconstruction acts, but before the passage of the act declaring Florida entitled to representation in Congress, the legislature of Florida, on the second Tuesday after its organization, proceeded, in accordance with the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, "regulating the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," to the election of two Senators to fill vacancies in the terms ending March 3, 1869, and March 3, 1873. At the end of three days these two elections had been made. On the fourth day the legislature proceeded to the election of a Senator for the term beginning March 4, 1869, and Mr. Gilbert was elected. In January, 1870, the same legislature held a new election and elected the petitioner for the term to which it had previously elected Mr. Gilbert. The petitioner claimed that the election of Mr. Gilbert was void because he had been elected before the passage of the act declaring Florida entitled to representation, and because he had not been elected in accordance with the act of July 25, 1866, inasmuch as the legislature had failed to take action on the "second Tuesday after its organization" in regard to the third Senator who was to be elected, but only in regard to the two Senators who were to fill the existing vacancies, and had taken no action in regard to the election of the third Senator until the third day after the "second Tuesday." April 13, 1870, the committee reported in regard to the first objection that the subsequent recognition of the State government made valid, by relation, its acts from the time of its organization; and in regard to the second objection, that the object of the act of Congress was to fix a time when proceedings for the election of Senators should be commenced and continued till the elections were effected, and that this legislature had acted in conformity therewith. They recommended the adoption of a resolution that Abijah Gilbert was duly elected and entitled to hold the seat, which was agreed to without a division April 28, 1870. Mr. Hart was allowed mileage and compensation.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journal, 2d sess. 41st Cong., and the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 41st Cong., No. 101.

Special references to the debates, which are found in parts 3 and 4 of the Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 41st Cong., are inserted below.

FRIDAY, April 1, 1870.

Mr. Osborn presented the petition* of Ossian B. Hart, of Florida, claiming to be entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator duly elected by the legislature of the State of Florida, and asking that his claim to said seat may be investigated by the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

[Remarks accompanying the presentation of the petition are found on pages 2330, 2331 of part 3 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

WEDNESDAY, April 13, 1870.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Ossian B. Hart, claiming to be entitled to the seat in the Senate now held by the Hon. Abijah Gilbert, as a Senator in Congress from the State of Florida, submitted a report (No. 101), accompanied by the following resolution. [Resolution found at end of report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Trumbull (chairman), Stewart, Edmunds, Conkling, Rice, Carpenter, and Thurman.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

APRIL 13, 1870.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trumbull, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Ossian B. Hart, of Florida, claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Florida for the term which commenced March 4, 1869, report as follows:

In consequence of the rebellion the State of Florida was without representation in the Senate of the United States from 1861 till 1868. In pursuance of a constitution framed and adopted under what are known as the reconstruction acts, a legislature convened in Florida, Monday, June 8, 1868, the members of the assembly and half of the senate having been elected for two years, and the other half of the senate for four years.

This legislature, on the 16th day of June, 1868, being the second Tuesday after its meeting and organization, proceeded in accordance with the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, "regulating the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," to take action for the election of two United States Senators to fill the then existing vacancies for the terms expiring on the 3d of March, 1869, and the 3d of March, 1873. On Wednesday, the day following that on which each house had separately but without result voted for Senators to fill the two existing vacancies, the members of the two houses convened in joint assembly, elected a Senator to fill the vacancy expiring March 3, 1869, and adjourned till the next day, when they again assembled and elected a Senator for the term expiring March 3, 1873, and adjourned without date.

The next day (Friday) the members of the two houses, each house having previously concurred in a resolution to that effect, assembled again in joint convention for the election of a Senator to succeed the one whose term would expire on the 3d of March, 1869, when Abijah Gilbert, the present sitting member, was elected.

The petitioner was chosen by the same legislature in January, 1870, to represent the State in the Senate for the term commencing March 4, 1869, and now claims the seat occupied by Mr. Gilbert.

The elections of 1868 all took place before the passage of the act of June 25, 1868, which declared Florida entitled to representation in Congress.

Two objections are taken to the election of the sitting member:

1. That he was chosen by the legislature of a State not at the time recognized as entitled to representation in Congress.

2. That he was not elected in conformity with the act of July 25, 1866.

The first objection is answered by the fact that the subsequent recognition of the State as entitled to representation under the Constitution, in pursuance of which the legislature was elected and organized, related back to and made valid its acts from the time of its organization. Senators and Representatives from several of the reconstructed States have been chosen before the States were declared entitled to representation, and no one has ever questioned their right to seats when Congress subsequently recognized the government under which they were chosen as entitled to representation.

The only ground for the other objection arises from the fact that the legislature failed to take action on the "second Tuesday after its organization" in regard to the third Senator who was to be elected, but it took action on the subject of electing Senators, and actually voted, though unsuccessfully, on that day for persons to fill the two existing vacancies.

The object of the act of Congress was to insure the election of Senators by the proper legislature, and to fix a time when proceedings for that purpose should be commenced and continued till the elections were effected.

The legislature by which the sitting member was elected was the one chosen next preceding the term which would commence on the 4th of March, 1869, and was, therefore, the proper legislature to elect. "The second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the legislature" was the time prescribed by the act of Congress for initiating the election of Senators, and that was the time when the legislature proceeded to that business. There being three Senators to elect, it took action on that day only in reference to two of them. Did its failure to take action on that day, and the two subsequent days (which were occupied in electing the first two Senators), in reference to the third Senator, render his election, in all other respects regular, invalid? The committee think not.

The language of the law is: "In case no person shall receive such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock, meridian, of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and take at least one vote till a Senator shall be elected." No formal adjournment from day to day by vote of the joint assembly was necessary, but it was the duty of the members of each house to meet in joint assembly at noon of each day and vote at least once till all the Senators whom the legislature had the right to elect were chosen. This is exactly what the legislature did.

In no view which the committee can take would the petitioner be entitled to a seat in the Senate, for if the election of the sitting Senator was irregular, that of the petitioner, by the same legislature at a subsequent session, was equally so.

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That Abijah Gilbert was duly elected a Senator from the State of Florida for the term commencing March 4, 1869, and is entitled to hold his seat as such.

FRIDAY, April 15, 1870.

Mr. Trumbull presented the memorial* of Ossian B. Hart, praying that he may be allowed to be heard in argument before the Senate in support of his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator duly elected by the legislature of the State of Florida.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

[The debate is found on pages 2705, 2706 of part 3 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

THURSDAY, April 28, 1870.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that Abijah Gilbert was duly elected a Senator from the State of Florida for the term commencing March 4, 1869, and is entitled to hold his seat as such; and the resolution was agreed to.

[The debate is found on pages 3053, 3054 of part 4 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

MONDAY, May 2, 1870.

Mr. Howe submitted the following resolution; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to O. B. Hart, claimant of a seat in the Senate from the State of Florida, the usual mileage of a Senator and the monthly pay from the date of presenting his credentials until the passage of the resolution declaring him not entitled to a seat."

TUESDAY, May 10, 1870.

Mr. Ferry, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution of May 2, 1870, to pay O. B. Hart the usual mileage of a Senator for one session and pay from the date of presenting his credentials until the passage of the resolution declaring him not entitled to a seat, reported it without amendment.

WEDNESDAY, May 11, 1870.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution to pay O. B. Hart the usual mileage of a Senator for one session and the monthly pay of a Senator from the date of presenting his credentials until the adoption of the resolution by the Senate declaring him not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Florida; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read the third time.

The said resolution was read the third time.

Resolved, That it pass.

[Forty-second Congress—First session.]

JOSEPH J. REYNOLDS vs. MORGAN C. HAMILTON, of Texas.

July 13, 1870, the credentials of Mr. Hamilton, elected for the term beginning March 4, 1871, were presented. March 3, 1871, the credentials of Mr. Reynolds, elected for the same term, were presented. March 4, both credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The facts in regard to the elections were as follows: Texas had been without representation in Congress from 1861 to 1870. After the passage of the several acts for the reconstruction of Texas, but before the passage of the act declaring her entitled to representation in Congress, the legislature of Texas, in February, 1870, proceeded, in accordance with the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, "regulating the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," to the election of Senators to fill vacancies in the terms ending March 3, 1871, and March 3, 1875. At the same time the legislature elected Mr. Hamilton for the term beginning March 4, 1871. The Senators elected to fill the vacancies were admitted to their seats. By the constitution of Texas there was another session of the same legislature after the elections referred to, and before March 4, 1871. The legislature at this second session passed a resolution declaring the election of Mr. Hamilton illegal, and on the second Tuesday after its organization elected Mr. Reynolds. Mr. Reynolds claimed the seat on the ground that the election of Mr. Hamilton was void, because he had been elected before the passage of the act declaring Texas entitled to representation, and because there was another session of the legislature after the election of Mr. Hamilton, and before the commencement of the term for which he was elected. March 18, the committee reported the facts as above, and the conclusions that the case was precisely like that of Hart and Gilbert (see page 320); that the election of Mr. Hamilton had been in accordance with the act referred to, which declares "that the legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator," &c.; and that the subsequent recognition of the State government of Texas had made valid, by relation, its acts from the time of its organization, so that the fact that the State was not admitted to representation when Mr. Hamilton was elected was immaterial. They recommended that Mr. Hamilton be admitted to his seat. He was admitted without debate.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 41st Cong. and 1st sess. 42d Cong.; and the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 1st sess. 42d Cong., No. 2.

There were no debates.

[Forty-first Congress.]

WEDNESDAY, July 13, 1870.

Mr. Nye presented the credentials of Morgan C. Hamilton, elected a Senator in Congress by the legislature of the State of Texas for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

The credentials were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1871.

Mr Morton presented the credentials of Joseph J. Reynolds, elected a Senator in Congress by the legislature of the State of Texas for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

The credentials were read.

[First session of the Forty-second Congress.]

SATURDAY, March 4, 1871.

Mr. Flanagan here submitted a motion that the oaths prescribed by law be administered by the Vice-President to Morgan C. Hamilton, whose credentials as Senator-elect from the State of Texas were presented on the 13th of July, 1870.

Mr. Morton presented a certified copy of a joint resolution of the legislature of the State of Texas, approved January 26, 1871, providing for the election of a United States Senator from that State on the 24th day of January, 1871, for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, and declaring the election of Morgan C. Hamilton, on the 22d of February, 1870, as Senator for said term, illegal; which was read.

On motion by Mr. Morton,

Ordered, That the resolution of the legislature of the State of Texas and the credentials of Mr. Morgan C. Hamilton and Mr. Joseph J. Reynolds lie on the table.

MONDAY, March 13, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Anthony,

Ordered, That the credentials of Joseph J. Reynolds, and the credentials of Morgan C. Hamilton, with the resolution of the legislature of Texas, declaring the election of said Hamilton on the 22d of February, 1870, as Senator from that State for six years from March 4, 1871, illegal, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1871.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of J. J. Reynolds, elected a Senator in Congress by the legislature of the State of Texas for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

The credentials were read.

[The letter accompanying the credentials states that inadvertently the governor had not signed the credentials presented March 3.]

SATURDAY, March 18, 1871.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Morgan C. Hamilton, the credentials of Joseph J. Reynolds, and the resolution of the legislature of the State of Texas declaring the election of Morgan C. Hamilton illegal, submitted a report (No. 2) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Morgan C. Hamilton was duly elected a Senator from the State of Texas for the term commencing March 4, 1871, and is entitled to take his seat as such upon taking the required oaths."

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution; and the resolution was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Stewart, Morton, Rice, Hamlin, Hill, and Thurman.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 18, 1871.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of the Hon. Morgan C. Hamilton, Senator-elect from the State of Texas, submit the following report:

That in pursuance of the several acts of Congress for the reconstruction of the State of Texas, the legislature convened on the 8th and completed its organization on the 10th of February, 1870. On the 22d of February, 1870, second Tuesday after its organization, the legislature elected the Hon. Morgan C. Hamilton a Senator of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1871.

The same legislature on the same day elected the Hon. J. W. Flanagan a Senator of the United States for the term ending March 3, 1875, and the Hon. Morgan C. Hamilton for the term ending March 3, 1871. These last two elections were to fill vacancies then existing, and both of these Senators were admitted to their seats.

By the constitution of Texas there was another session of the same legislature held in Texas, after the election of Mr. Hamilton, and before the expiration of his term. This session commenced on the 10th of January, 1871, and on the second Tuesday after its organization proceeded to the election of a Senator for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1871, the same term for which Mr. Hamilton had been elected at the preceding session.

General J. J. Reynolds is represented to have been elected, although the certificate referred to the committee is not signed by the governor.

The reasons assigned for the election of General Reynolds are that the legislature had no authority to elect Mr. Hamilton at the time of his election, first, because the State had not at that time been recognized as entitled to representation in Congress; and, secondly, because there was another session of the legislature after the election of Mr. Hamilton, and before the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

The case of Hon. Abijah Gilbert, Senator from Florida, is precisely in point upon both of these questions.

The act of Congress of July 25, 1866, declares "that the legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in the place of such Senator so going out of office, in the following manner."

The fact that the State was not admitted to representation until after the election of Mr. Hamilton is immaterial. The act admitting Texas to representation related back to the organization, and ratified the proceedings of the legislature.

The committee therefore recommend that Mr. Hamilton be permitted to take his seat on taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the laws.

MONDAY, March 20, 1871.

Mr. Morgan C. Hamilton, from the State of Texas, attended, and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the Vice-President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[Forty-second Congress—First and second sessions.]

GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE,

Senator from Alabama from January 15, 1872, till March 3, 1877.

February 6, 1871, the credentials of Mr. Goldthwaite, elected for the term beginning March 4, 1871, were presented. March 4, a protest of members of the legislature of Alabama against his admission to a seat in the Senate was presented; which, with the credentials, was ordered to lie on the table. March 13, the credentials and protest were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. March 20, the committee reported that there would not be time at that session of Congress fully to consider the grounds upon which his right to a seat was contested, and reported a resolution that he be permitted to take his seat, and that the committee proceed thereafter to consider the grounds of the protest and report to the Senate thereon. This report and resolution included the case of Foster Blodgett, of Georgia, it being unanimous as to Mr. Goldthwaite, two dissenting as to Mr. Blodgett. A motion was made to amend the resolution by striking out the name of Foster Blodgett, but after debate it was ordered that the resolution lie on the table. January 9, 1872, in the next session of Congress, the case of Mr. Blodgett having been disposed of, the Senate resolved "that George Goldthwaite be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat in the Senate is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon." January 15, Mr. Goldthwaite took his seat. No further report was made on the case, and the Senate took no further action in regard to it. The chief grounds of the protest (given below) were that some of the members of the legislature voting for Mr. Goldthwaite were not legally elected, having been either defeated at the polls or having procured their elections through fraud; that one member voting for Mr. Goldthwaite had no certificate of election to the legislature; that some members voting for him were under political disabilities.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 3d sess. 41st Cong., and 1st and 2d sess. 42d Cong.; the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 42d Cong., 1st sess., No. 3; and a copy of the protest above referred to from the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong., pages 1, 2.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

[Third session of the Forty-first Congress.]

MONDAY, February 6, 1871.

Mr. Spencer presented the credentials of George Goldthwaite, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of Alabama for the term of six years commencing on the 4th of March, 1871.

The credentials were read.

[First session of the Forty-second Congress.]

MONDAY, March 4, 1871.

Mr. George Goldthwaite, whose credentials were presented on the 6th day of February last, appeared to take the oaths prescribed by law, when

Mr. Sherman presented a protest signed by forty-five members of the senate and house of representatives of the legislature of the State of Alabama against the admission of George Goldthwaite to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from said State; which was read.

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Sherman,

Ordered, That the protest, with the credentials of Mr. Goldthwaite, lie upon the table.

[The debate is found on pages 1–4 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

Protest of members of the Alabama legislature against the admission of Mr. Goldthwaite to a seat in the Senate.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., January 26, 1871.

To the Senate of the United States:

The subscribers, members of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Alabama, respectfully represent:

That they protest against the admission of Hon. George Goldthwaite to the Senate of the United States as a Senator from Alabama, on the grounds that he was not elected by a majority of the legal votes of the joint meeting of the legislature. He was declared elected by the following vote: For George Goldthwaite, 65 votes; for Willard Warner, 50; for William J. Haralson, 14 votes. It will be seen that 65 votes constitute a majority of the votes cast, and that number of legal votes are necessary to an election.

We represent that Hon. George Goldthwaite did not receive that number of legal votes, as B. M. Henry, claiming to be a representative from Russell County, in said State, who voted for Hon. George Goldthwaite, was not elected by the people of said county, did not have a certificate of his election, as is required by our laws, but was defeated at the polls by several hundred, and was not legally entitled to vote for a United States Senator in said joint meeting of the legislature, which, if said illegal votes had been rejected, would have been sufficient to prevent the announcement of the election of Hon. George Goldthwaite to a seat in your honorable body.

Saul Bradford, of Talladega county, who had been rejected by the people at the ballot-box, was permitted to vote for said Hon. George Goldthwaite, when in our opinion his vote should have been rejected, as he had never been legally elected a member of the legislature.

In the counties of Greene, Sumter, Lee, and other counties, the representatives of which all voted for Hon. George Goldthwaite, we have every reason to believe that the elections of said representatives were procured by intimidating the voters, and in several instances fraud added thereto, and that the gentlemen claiming to be representatives of these counties were not legally elected by the people of said counties, are not their legal representatives, and were not entitled to vote for United States Senator at the joint meeting of the general assembly.

We are informed that some of the members of the legislature who voted for Hon. George Goldthwaite are laboring under political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and it is an inquiry worthy the consideration of the Senate of the United States whether Hon. George Goldthwaite is not laboring under the same disabilities for his actions during the recent rebellion of the Southern States.

Believing, therefore, that Hon. George Goldthwaite is not legally elected Senator from Alabama, we respectfully pray that the Senate of the United States may so decide, and declare his seat vacant.

[The names of the signers are here omitted.]

MONDAY, March 13, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Anthony,

Ordered, That the credentials of George Goldthwaite, and the protest of members of the legislature of the State of Alabama against the election of said Goldthwaite as a Senator of the United States by the legislature of said State, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MONDAY, March 20, 1871.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Foster Blodgett, with the memorial of members of the legislature of the State of Georgia, protesting against the admission of said Blodgett to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from that State, and the credentials of George Goldthwaite, with the protest of sundry members of the legislature of the State of Alabama against the election of said Goldthwaite, submitted a report (No. 3) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution. [Resolution found at end of report.]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 20, 1871.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of George Goldthwaite, claiming a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama, and the credentials of Foster Blodgett, claiming a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Georgia, report:

That said credentials are in due form, and prima facie entitle said Goldthwaite and Blodgett to their seats upon taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and laws, neither of them being under any disability.

The grounds on which their right to seats are contested have not been fully considered by the committee for want of time, nor will there be sufficient time at this session to consider them. In the opinion of your committee it would be unjust to those States and gentlemen to keep the latter out of their seats until such investigation can be had.

The committee therefore report the following resolution:

Resolved, That George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett be permitted to take seats in this body upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which their rights to seats, respectively, are contested, and hereafter make reports to the Senate thereon.

WM. M. STEWART.
O. P. MORTON.
H. HAMLIN.
B. F. RICE.

We concur in the foregoing as to Goldthwaite, but not as to Blodgett.

JOSHUA HILL.
A. G. THURMAN.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to admit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to seats in the Senate of the United States as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; when

Mr. Thurman called for a division of the question, so that it shall be taken first upon the admission of George Goldthwaite to his seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Pending debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 218, 219 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

SATURDAY, March 25, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 271–274 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

THURSDAY, April 6, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators respectively from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

A division of the question having heretofore been called for by Mr. Thurman, so that a separate vote be taken on the admission of each person named in the resolution,

The Vice-President decided that the question on the resolution was not susceptible of a division, as desired by Mr. Thurman, but that the end desired by him could be attained by amendment.

On motion by Mr. Hill to amend the resolution by striking out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators respectively from the States of Alabama and Georgia.

On motion by Mr. Edmunds, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

[The debate is found on pages 506, 507 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

FRIDAY, April 7, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators respectively from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill,

On motion by Mr. Anthony, and by unanimous consent, the further consideration was informally passed over.

* * * * * * *

The Senate then again resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators respectively from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill to the resolution to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

On motion by Mr. Edmunds, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

[No debate took place.]

MONDAY, April 10, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators respectively from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill to the resolution to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Edmunds that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 25, nays 26.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Ames, Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hill, Hitchcock, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pratt, Sawyer, Scott, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, and Windom.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Casserly, Clayton, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Gilbert, Hamlin, Johnston, Kelly, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, Thurman, West, and Wright.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to; and

Pending further debate,

Mr. Thurman raised a question of order, namely: That in discussing the question before the Senate debate upon the question whether Foster Blodgett or Joshua Hill had or had not committed perjury was not in order.

The Vice-President sustained the point of order raised by Mr. Thurman, and ruled the debate on that question out of order; and

After further debate,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the Senate adjourned.

[The debate which took place, pages 540–558 of the Congressioual Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong., was wholly on the case of Mr. Blodgett.]

TUESDAY, April 11, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill to the resolution to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

On motion by Mr. Edmunds that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 17.

On motion by Mr. Robertson, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Ames, Anthony, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Davis of West Virginia, Edmunds, Harlan, Hill, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Pratt, Scott, Sherman, Tipton, Wilson, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Blair, Casserly, Cooper, Davis of Kentucky, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Johnston, Morton, Rice, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wickers.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

[No debate took place.]

[Second session of the Forty-second Congress.]

THURSDAY, December 21, 1871.

Mr. Thurman submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That George Goldthwaite be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama. upon taking the oath, and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon."

[The debate is found on pages 261, 262 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 42d Cong.]

TUESDAY, January 9, 1872.

On motion by Mr. Thurman that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 20th of March last, to admit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to seats in the Senate as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia, it was determined in the affirmative, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the said resolution.

On the question to agree to the resolution, which is in the following words:

"Resolved, That George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett be permitted to take seats in this body upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which their rights to seats, respectively, are contested, and hereafter make reports to the Senate thereon,"

On motion by Mr. Thurman to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof inserting:

"That George Goldthwaite be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon,"

It was determined in the affirmative; and

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it was determined in the affirmative.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

[The debate is found on pages 319, 320 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 2d sess. 42d Cong.]

MONDAY, January 15, 1872.

Mr. George Goldthwaite, from the State of Alabama, attended, and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the Vice-President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

[Forty-second Congress—First and second sessions.]

THOMAS M. NORWOOD vs. FOSTER BLODGETT, of Georgia.

January 20, 1871, the credentials of Mr. Blodgett, elected for the term beginning March 4, 1871, were presented. March 2, a memorial of members of the last general assembly of Georgia, remonstrating against his admission to a seat in the Senate, was presented. March 13, the credentials and memorial were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. March 20, the committee reported that there would not be time at that session of Congress fully to consider the grounds upon which his right to a seat was contested, and reported a resolution that he be permitted to take his seat and that the committee proceed thereafter to consider the grounds of the remonstrance and report to the Senate thereon. This report and resolution included the case of George Goldthwaite, of Alabama. After debate it was ordered that the resolution lie on the table. December 4, 1871, in the next session of Congress, the credentials of Mr. Norwood, elected for the same term, were presented. December 11, they were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. December 18, the committee reported in favor of Mr. Norwood. It appears that the legislature electing Mr. Blodgett was elected in April, 1868. By the laws of Georgia then in force it was provided that another legislature should be elected in November, 1870, and should meet and organize in January, 1871. The legislature electing Mr. Blodgett, subsequently to his election, provided by law that the legislature which was to be elected in November, 1870, and organized in January, 1871, should not be elected until December, 1870, and should not meet and organize until November, 1871. This second legislature was the one electing Mr. Norwood. The question to be decided was, which was the legislature "chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress?" (Act of July 25, 1866.) It was claimed by Mr. Blodgett that chosen and elected mean different things; that the legislators are elected by the people, but that the legislature is not chosen until the members elected assemble and organize as a legislature; that the legislature electing Mr. Norwood did not assemble until after March 4, 1871, and so could not be the one "chosen next preceding the expiration," &c. The committee reported that the meaning of the act referred to was that "the legislature whose members should be elected next preceding the expiration of the Senatorial term should elect the successor"; that the words chosen and elected were synonymous. They reported a resolution that Mr. Norwood was entitled to the seat, which was agreed to December 19, and Mr. Norwood took the oath of office.

Mr. Blodgett was allowed compensation and mileage.

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 3d sess. 41st Cong., and 1st and 2d sess. 42d Cong., and the reports of the committee from Senate Reports, 42d Cong., 1st sess., No. 3, and 42d Cong., 2d sess., vol. 1, No. 10.

Special references to the debates of each day are inserted below.

[Third session of the Forty-first Congress.]

FRIDAY, January 20, 1871.

Mr. Morton presented the credentials of Mr. Foster Blodgett, elected a Senator from the State of Georgia for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

The credentials were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1871.

Mr. Hill presented a memorial of members of the last general assembly of the State of Georgia, remonstrating against the admission of Foster Blodgett to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

[First session of the Forty-second Congress.]

SATURDAY, March 4, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Morton,

Ordered, That the credentials of Mr. Foster Blodgett, as Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, and the protest of members of the general assembly of the State of Georgia against his election, on the files of the last Congress, be taken from the files and laid on the table.

[The debate is found on pages 4, 5 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

MONDAY, March 13, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Anthony,

Ordered, That the credentials of Foster Blodgett and the memorial of members of the general assembly of the State of Georgia against the admission of said Blodgett to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from that State be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MONDAY, March 20, 1871.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Foster Blodgett, with the memorial of members of the legislature of the State of Georgia, protesting against the admission of said Blodgett to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from that State, and the credentials of George Goldthwaite, with the protest of sundry members of the legislature of the State of Alabama against the election of said Goldthwaite, submitted a report (No. 3) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett be permitted to take seats in this body upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which their rights to seats, respectively, are contested, and hereafter make reports to the Senate thereon."

Mr. Hill presented a brief* of the memorial of members of the legislature of the State of Georgia, protesting against the admission of Foster Blodgett to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from that State.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 20, 1871.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Stewart, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of George Goldthwaite, claiming a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama, and the credentials of Foster Blodgett, claiming a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Georgia, report:

That said credentials are in due form, and prima facie entitle said Goldthwaite and Blodgett to their seats upon taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and laws, neither of them being under any disability.

The grounds on which their rights to seats are contested have not been fully considered by the committee for want of time, nor will there be sufficient time at this session to consider them. In the opinion of your committee it would be unjust to those States and gentlemen to keep the latter out of their seats until such investigation can be had.

The committee therefore report the following resolution:

Resolved, That George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett be permitted to take seats in this body upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which their rights to seats, respectively, are contested, and hereafter make reports to the Senate thereon.

WM. M. STEWART.
O. P. MORTON.
H. HAMLIN.
B. F. RICE.

We concur in the foregoing as to Goldthwaite, but not as to Blodgett.

JOSHUA HILL.
A. G. THURMAN.

TUESDAY, March 21, 1871.

Mr. Hill presented the memorial† of John E. Bryant, of Georgia, remonstrating against the admission of Foster Blodgett to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Georgia.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to admit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to seats in the Senate of the United States as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; when

Mr. Thurman called for a division of the question, so that it shall be taken first upon the admission of George Goldthwaite to his seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Pending debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

[The debate is found on pages 218, 219 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

SATURDAY, March 25, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 271–274 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

THURSDAY, April 6, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

A division of the question having heretofore been called for by Mr. Thurman, so that a separate vote be taken on the admission of each person named in the resolution,

The Vice-President decided that the question on the resolution was not susceptible of a division, as desired by Mr. Thurman, but that the end desired by him could be attained by amendment.

On motion by Mr. Hill to amend the resolution by striking out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to to-morrow.

* * * * * * *

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia.

On motion by Mr. Edmunds, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

[The debate is found on pages 506, 507 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

FRIDAY, April 7, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill,

On motion by Mr. Anthony, and by unanimous consent, the further consideration was informally passed over.

* * * * * * *

The Senate then again resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill to the resolution to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

On motion by Mr. Edmunds, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

[No debate took place.]

MONDAY, April 10, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill to the resolution to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Edmunds that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 25, nays 26.

On motion by Mr. Stewart, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Ames, Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hill, Hitchcock, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pratt, Sawyer, Scott, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, and Windom.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Casserly, Clayton, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Gilbert, Hamlin, Johnston, Kelly, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, Thurman, West, and Wright.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to; and

Pending further debate,

Mr. Thurman raised a question of order, viz: That in discussing the question before the Senate debate upon the question whether Foster Blodgett or Joshua Hill had or had not committed perjury was not in order.

The Vice-President sustained the point of order raised by Mr. Thurman, and ruled the debate on that question out of order; and

After further debate,

On motion by Mr. Trumbull (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the Senate adjourned.

[The debate, which was wholly on the credentials of Mr. Blodgett, is found on pages 540–558 of the Congressional Globe, part 1, 1st sess. 42d Cong.]

TUESDAY, April 11, 1871.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to permit George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett to take seats in the Senate of the United States, upon taking the proper oaths, as Senators, respectively, from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hill to the resolution to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett,"

On motion by Mr. Edmunds that the resolution lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 17.

On motion by Mr. Robertson, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Ames, Anthony, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Davis of West Virginia, Edmunds, Harlan, Hill, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Pratt, Scott, Sherman, Tipton, Wilson, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Bayard, Blair, Casserly, Cooper, Davis of Kentucky, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Johnston, Morton, Rice, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, and Vickers.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

[No debate took place.]

[Second session of the Forty-second Congress.]

MONDAY, December 4, 1871.

Mr. Thurman presented the credentials of Thomas M. Norwood, elected a Senator by the general assembly of the State of Georgia for the term of six years commencing March 4, 1871; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 11, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Thurman,

Ordered, That the credentials of Thomas M. Norwood, claiming a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Georgia, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MONDAY, December 18, 1871.

Mr. Carpenter, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Thomas M. Norwood, claiming a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Georgia, submitted a report (No. 10) thereon, accompanied by the following resolution. (Resolution found at end of report.)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

[The committee consisted of Messrs. Morton (chairman), Rice, Carpenter, Logan, Hill, Thurman, and Anthony.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

DECEMBER 18, 1871.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Carpenter, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Foster Blodgett and Thomas M. Norwood, each claiming a seat as Senator from the State of Georgia for the term which commenced March 4, 1871, respectfully submit the following report:

The Senate being a branch of the Government of the United States, the right to elect a Senator is conferred and its exercise regulated by the Constitution of the United States, and no law or regulation of a State touching such election has any validity beyond the authority conferred upon the State by the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution, Article I, section 3, provides that Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the respective States. Section 4 of the same article provides:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The first clause of this section commits to the legislatures of the States primarily the whole subject of electing Senators and Representatives, and authorizes them to make such regulations upon the subject as they may deem proper. The phrase "the times, places, and manner of holding such elections for Senators and Representatives" embraces the whole subject of election of Senator except that the election must be made by the legislature of the State, as provided in the third section. The legislature may therefore provide that a Senator shall be elected by the legislature to be chosen next before the expiration of a term or next after its commencement. The second clause, quoted from the fourth section, confers upon Congress the same power and absolute control over the subject, to be exercised in the discretion of Congress, except that Congress cannot fix a place for holding the election different from that fixed by the State legislature.

In the exercise of this undoubted constitutional power Congress passed an act regulating the election of Senators, approved July 25, 1866 (14 Stat. at Large, page 243), which provides:

"The legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in place of such Senator so going out of office."

Foster Blodgett claims to have been elected on the 15th day of February, A. D. 1870, by the legislature then existing and in session. He received the requisite number of votes, and his credentials are in due form. The question, therefore, is whether it was competent for that legislature to elect a Senator to serve during the term before mentioned. If this question can be answered in the affirmative, Mr. Blodgett is entitled to the seat; if not, his pretended election was an absolute nullity. The answer to this question depends upon the true construction of the act of Congress before quoted. It is claimed by Mr. Blodgett that chosen and elected mean different things; that legislators are elected by the people, but that legislators are not the legislature, and that the legislature is not chosen until the members elected assemble as provided by law and organize as a legislature by determining what persons elected or claiming to be elected are entitled to seats. That is, the people elect the legislators, and the legislators after their election choose the legislature, and hence the legislature which was in fact organized next preceding the expiration of the term of office is the one authorized to elect a successor without regard to the time when the members of such legislature were elected by the people.

This refinement of reasoning does not meet the approbation of your committee. The question is, what was the intention of Congress in passing this act? The legislature designated by the act is the one "which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time," &c. There is no such thing as choosing a legislature except by choosing its members. The Constitution declares that Senators shall be elected by the legislature of each State. Hence the act of Congress employs the same phrase. But your committee cannot doubt that it was the intention of Congress to provide that the legislature whose members should be elected next preceding the expiration of the Senatorial term should elect the successor. The distinction sought to be established between the words elected and chosen derives no support from popular or legal lexicography. Elected is defined chosen and chosen is defined elected, and the words are used as synonymous in the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of every State, in all our statutes, and in all popular literature. It is a universal rule of construction, applicable to constitutions and statutes, that words are to be understood in their popular, commonly received meaning, and to force upon this statute so unnatural a construction would defeat the intention of Congress, manifest in the act itself, and violate the fundamental principle of free government which doubtless inspired the passage of the act.

The legislature which was in session on the 15th day of February, 1870, when Mr. Blodgett claims to have been elected, was chosen in April, 1868. By the constitution and laws of Georgia then in force it was provided that another legislature should be elected on Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1870, and that the legislature so to be elected should meet and organize on the second Wednesday in January, 1871. Thus it will be seen that at the time Mr. Blodgett claims to have been elected there was to be another legislature elected and organized prior to the expiration of the term for which Mr. Blodgett claims to have been elected to serve. Therefore, as the case then stood, the action of that legislature in the premises was without authority and directly in contravention of the act of Congress upon that subject. It is not claimed that Mr. Blodgett was elected at any other time or by any other legislature. The validity of his election must depend upon the state of case then existing. If the legislature had no authority to elect him at that time, their pretending to do so conferred upon him no right to claim this seat. If he has any rights they vested by that election, and were perfect as soon as the election was completed. His election was either valid or void; if valid, no subsequent action of the legislature could impair his rights; if void, no subsequent action of the legislature, short of another election, could entitle him to this seat.

Subsequently to Mr. Blodgett's pretended election the legislature provided by law, as it was authorized to do by the constitution of the State, that the legislature which was to be elected in November, 1870, and organized in January, 1871, as required by law at the time of Blodgett's pretended election, should not be elected until December, 1870, and should not convene and organize until November, 1871. But if your committee are right in their construction of the act of Congress, the legislature which convened in November, 1871, was the legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the Senatorial term, and, consequently, that legislature was the one which was authorized to elect the successor; and this legislature did, in fact, elect Mr. Norwood. The fact that the State for months after the expiration of the former term, March 4, 1871, was without full representation in the Senate is not the fault of the act of Congress. The legislature authorized under the act of Congress to make this election would have been elected in November, 1870, and convened in January, 1871, and might have elected a Senator prior to the expiration of the former term but for the action of the State in postponing the election and organization of the legislature authorized to elect the successor. The State cannot complain of its own act, nor ask the Senate to disregard the act of Congress, because the State has intentionally omitted to comply with the act of Congress and avail itself of its provisions.

Therefore, Mr. Norwood having been duly elected at the first session of the legislature which was chosen prior to the expiration of the former term, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thomas M. Norwood is entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Georgia for the term commencing March 4, 1871, and that he be admitted to the same.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1871.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, to admit Thomas M. Norwood to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Georgia; and,

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was

Resolved, That Thomas M. Norwood is entitled to a seat in the Senate, as a Senator from the State of Georgia, for the term commencing March 4, 1871, and that he be admitted to the same.

Whereupon

Mr. Norwood appeared, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Vice-President, he took his seat in the Senate.

COMPENSATION OF MR. BLODGETT.

Mr. Morton submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay, out of the pay and mileage account, to Foster Blodgett, claiming a seat as Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, the pay and mileage of a Senator, commencing March 4, 1871, to the passage of this resolution."

TUESDAY, January 9, 1872.

On motion by Mr. Morton that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on the 19th December last, to pay Foster Blodgett the pay and mileage of a Senator for the period therein named, it was determined in the affirmative; and

Mr. Morton having modified the said resolution,

After debate,

On the question to agree to the resolution, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay, out of the pay and mileage account, to Foster Blodgett, claiming a seat as Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, the pay and mileage of a Senator from March 4, 1871, to the 19th of December, 1871, when the question of his right to his seat was determined by the Senate,"

It was determined in the affirmative.

So the resolution as modified was agreed to.

[Forty-second Congress—Second session.]

MATT W. RANSOM vs. JOSEPH C. ABBOTT, of North Carolina.

Mr. Abbott's term expired March 3, 1871. March 7, a memorial of Mr. Abbott was presented, claiming that he had been legally elected for the succeeding term. March 13, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. February 28, 1872, the committee reported as follows: At the election held in November, 1870, Zebulon B. Vance received "a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house," and Mr. Abbott received the next highest number of votes. On the day following the election Mr. Vance was declared duly elected. Mr. Vance at the date of the election was under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. Mr. Abbott rested his claim on what he assumed to be the legal result of the conceded ineligibility of Mr. Vance. He assumed that it was a conclusion of law that if the candidate receiving the highest number of votes was ineligible, and that ineligibility was known to the electors, the votes so cast for him were void, and should be considered mere nullities, and, consequently, that the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes was elected. The committee were of opinion that, while that might be the English rule, it was directly at variance with our theory of government; and that the English rule was not applicable in this case for the reason also that the amendment imposing the disabilities also provided for the removal of them by Congress, and that consequently the election of Mr. Vance was not void but voidable only; that the removals of these disabilities after election in several previous cases by acts of Congress were decisions that such votes were not mere nullities. The committee were furthermore of opinion that the facts in this case would not bring it within the English rule, supposing it to be admitted that that rule was applicable here. The committee recommended the adoption of a resolution that Mr. Abbott, not having received a majority of the votes cast, was not entitled to a seat. There was a minority report in support of Mr. Abbott's claim. April 23, 1872, the Senate agreed to the resolution reported by the committee.

The credentials of Mr. Vance were not presented, and no claim was made to the seat by him.

February 5, 1872, pending the action of the committee on Mr. Abbott's memorial, the credentials of Mr. Ransom were presented and referred to the committee. They certified that he had been elected January 30, 1872, to fill a vacancy existing by reason of the resignation of Zebulon B. Vance. April 24, the day after the Senate resolved that Mr. Abbott was not entitled to the seat, the committee reported that Mr. Ransom's credentials appeared to be in due form, and recommended that he be admitted to his seat. He was admitted the same day.

The Senate resolved that Mr. Abbott be allowed compensation, and that Mr. Ransom's pay commence on the first day of the term.*

The history of the case here given consists of a transcript of the proceedings of the Senate relating to it from Senate Journals, 42d Cong., 1st and 2d sess., and the report of the committee from Senate Reports, 2d sess. 42d Cong., No. 58.

Special references to the debates of each day, which are found in the Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 42d Cong., part 3, and in the Appendix, are inserted below.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1871.

Mr. Pool presented the memorial† of Joseph C. Abbott, claiming to have been legally elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of North Carolina for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

MONDAY, March 13, 1871.

On motion by Mr. Pool,

Ordered, That the memorial of Joseph C. the North Carolina legislature on the second Tuesday in November, 1870, for the office of Senator of the United States, is not entitled to a seat in said United States Senate as such Senator."

Mr. Carpenter asked and obtained leave to present the views of the minority of the committee on the memorial of Mr. Abbott; which were ordered to be printed, to accompany the foregoing report.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE, AND VIEWS OF MINORITY.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 28, 1872.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Logan, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph C. Abbott, claiming to be entitled to a seat in this body as a Senator from North Carolina, for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1871, respectfully submit the following report:

Article I, section 5, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

The duty which devolves upon the Senate in deciding cases that arise under this clause of the Constitution is in the nature of a judicial proceeding, and the cases must be decided upon the evidence presented, and in accordance with legal principles, as established by former parliamentary and judicial precedents and decisions.

The only evidence which is before the committee in relation to the claim of the memorialist Abbott to a seat in the Senate of the United States is as follows:

That, on the second Tuesday of November, 1870, the day prescribed by law, the two houses of the legislature of North Carolina proceeded to the election of a Senator from that State for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, with the following results:

	Votes.
In the house of representatives:
Zebulon B. Vance received	63
Joseph C. Abbott received	32
Scattering	10
Members present	105
In the senate:
Zebulon B. Vance received	32
Joseph C. Abbott received	11
Scattering	5
Members present	48

That the number of members present at the time and so voting constituted a quorum of each house of the legislature; the constitution of North Carolina providing that "neither house shall proceed upon public business unless a majority of all the members are actually present," the numbers so present amounting to a majority of all the members.

On the following day the two houses, in the usual form, declared that Vance had received a majority of the votes cast in both houses, and that he was duly elected as such Senator for said term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

It is also further in evidence that said Vance was not on said second Tuesday of November, 1870, and at no time since has been, qualified to serve as such Senator, owing to disability imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution.

It is averred that the members of the legislature of North Carolina so voting for Vance, at the time their votes were cast, had notice of the ineligibility of Vance, but no evidence on this point has been presented to the committee, the memorialist relying upon the assumption that this was a matter of public notoriety.

It appears, therefore, that Abbott rests his claim to the seat solely upon what he assumes to be the legal result of the conceded ineligibility of Vance, who, although receiving a majority of the votes, is not entitled to take the oath of office or hold the seat. He assumes that it is a conclusion of law that if the candidate who has received the highest number of votes is ineligible, and that ineligibility was known to those who voted for him before casting their votes, that the votes so cast for him are void, and should be considered as nullities, and as though they never had been cast; and, consequently, the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes is elected.

In support of this view of the case the memorialist has called the attention of the committee to a large number of English authorities bearing on this question. While the committee make no question as to the general tenor of the decisions to which attention has been called, yet it is evident that these are based upon a very different rule from that adopted in our country. To show that this rule is different, the committee would refer to the following authorities, which are cited in the very able report of Mr. Dawes from the Committee on Elections, in the case of Smith vs. J. Y. Brown (Report of Committees, No. 11, 2d sess. 40th Cong.).

Haywood on County Elections, 535:

"If, before the election comes on, or a majority has polled, sufficient notice has been publicly given of his ineligibility, the unsuccessful candidate next to him on the poll must ultimately be the sitting member."

Male on Elections, 336:

"If an election is made of a person or persons ineligible, such election is void, where the ineligibility is clear and pointed out to the electors at the poll."

In the case of King vs. Hawkins (10 East., 210), Lord Ellenborough states that such is the law in England, "after notice of ineligibility."

In the case of Claridge vs. Evelyn (5 B. and A., 8), Abbott, C. J., remarks:

"I am of the opinion, therefore, that he (the infant) was ineligible, and due notice of his incapacity having been given to the electors at the time of the election, their votes are thrown away."

Clerke on Election Committees, 156:

"Whenever a candidate is disqualified from sitting in Parliament, and notice thereof is publicly given to the electors, all votes given to such disqualified candidate will be considered as thrown away."

This notice, in order to bring the case within the rule, was required to be strictly formal, and was generally given at the polls. And the reason for this is apparent, as by their theory a voter who, after due notice of the ineligibility of a candidate, persisted in voting for him, was deemed guilty of a crime. Therefore, as all crimes are committed with an intention to commit the offense, it was necessary that the knowledge of the fact by the voter should be clear.

Roe on Elections, 256:

"It will be seen that the latter proposition is that which constitutes the law in cases where misapplication of the franchise by the electors was willful, and therefore made in their own wrong."

But is such a principle applicable in a government based upon the theory that the power emanates from the people? In the British Government the case is exactly the reverse, as there the theory is that the power originates with the monarch, and the privileges allowed the people to select representatives are, under that theory, considered as conceded and not as inherent rights. But this Government rests upon an entirely different basis. Here the power originates with the people, and that which the Government is authorized to exercise is conceded by the people. The right to designate who shall exercise this power has never been delegated. The method by which this choice shall be made known consistent with this theory can never be otherwise than by giving the majority or plurality the right to decide. Any attempt to restrict the right of the voter is an attempt to invade that right; therefore the theory that casting a vote knowingly for an ineligible candidate is in the nature of a crime which may be punished by ignoring the act of the majority and recognizing the act of the minority is in direct conflict with that most sacred right which the people of this Government have always guarded with jealous care. Such a rule is consistent with the theory of the British Government, as it affords one means of preventing the power from passing into the hands of the people; but it is directly at variance with the theory of our Government, as it affords one means by which that right which the people have of selecting their representatives may be abridged.

While, therefore, the general tenor of the English authorities to which he refers us is admitted to be as claimed by the memorialist, yet we do not conceive such a rule to be applicable to and consistent with the political institutions of the United States, where the right of the majority to govern and the Government is based upon the consent of the governed is one of the first political lessons to be learned.

There is also another very strong reason why the English authorities relied upon by the memorialist are not applicable in the present case, even if the spirit and fundamental idea of our institutions were insufficient to show this.

The third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which imposes the disabilities in question, also contemplates and provides for the removal thereof by Congress. There is no such feature in the English law. The English cases are therefore based upon a very different state of facts from those that exist in this country, and are not precedents for this case.

It is difficult to conceive how the Constitution could grant authority to Congress to remove the disabilities under which an individual who has been elected is laboring, and allow him to take his seat as a member, and yet at the same time embrace the idea that such an election is wholly void and the votes cast for him nullities. Yet Congress by its action in numerous instances has given the first construction to this clause of the Constitution, and if the memorialist in this case shall be admitted to his seat the Senate will have to give the second construction.

The English law in question does not obtain in the United States, as is clearly shown from the following considerations:

First. The judicial decisions are against it, there being but one decision which sustains it, namely, the Indiana case of 14 Ind., page 927; while on the other hand are the decisions in Maine, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and California, to which your committee would refer, and from which the following quotations are made:

1795. The State vs. Anderson (1 Cox, N. J. Rep., 318):

"Anderson was elected sheriff of Hunterdon. He had not been three years a freeholder, and was therefore absolutely disqualified, the statute of 1788 having declared that no person shall hereafter be eligible to the office of sheriff in any county in this State unless he shall be and hath been an inhabitant thereof and possessing a freehold estate in his own right in fee-simple in the same county for three years previous to his election."—(324.)

Held by the court—

"That Anderson was disqualified, but that his election was not void. The election of an unqualified person as sheriff is not ipso facto void; it is only voidable.—(Syllabus, 318). Still, however, we think the election not ipso facto void."—(Opinion, 327.)

1849. State vs. Giles, ex rel. Dunning, &c. (1 Chand., Wis. Rep., 112):

"Two questions arose in this case:

"First. Whether the person holding the office of sheriff at the time of the adoption of the constitution was eligible to that office at the next ensuing election.

"Second. If the then sheriff was ineligible, whether the person who at that election received the next highest number of votes could be considered as entitled to the office.—(13.)

"'The mere ineligibility of a person to hold a particular office, and who receives the greatest number of votes, such votes are not a mere nullity, but should be counted by the canvassers. A contestant for the same office, and receiving a lesser number of votes, though eligible, cannot be regarded as elected, and does not thereby become invested with the right to the office.'—(Syllabus, 112.)

"It is proper to say that we are all of the opinion that the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not, as the law now is, render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers, and that in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number is not thereby elected. If any public embarrassment is apprehended from this, such as that an office may remain indefinitely vacant by reason of a majority of the electors obstinately persisting in voting for an ineligible person, it is within the undoubted power of the legislature to prevent it by enacting that all such votes shall be deemed void and not be counted."—(Opinion, 117.)

And this remedy is so reasonable and practical that we may well ask, if it is intended that the English rule shall prevail in this country, why has it not been resorted to? Our answer is that such an idea is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and opposed to the principle that all power granted is by the consent of the governed. When we decide that a minority of votes may elect we strike a blow at the very heart of this republican principle.

1855. 38 Maine Rep., 597:

A majority of the votes at the election in Sagadahoc County were cast for Abel C. Dinslow for county commissioner. There was no such person in being. The governor submitted to the judges the question whether it was competent "to throw out the votes for Abel C. Dinslow and issue a new commission to such person who is eligible to said office as shall appear to have the highest number of votes?"

The judges answered in the negative.

They were further asked whether the office was vacant.

The judges answered it was.

1861. State ex rel. Off. vs. Smith (14 Wis., 497):

"The remaining questions are: First. Whether the defendant, being an alien and not a qualified elector at the time of his election, was eligible to the office. Second. If he was ineligible, whether the relator, who received the next highest number of votes cast is entitled to the office.

"The last question has been already settled in this State by the case of the State vs. Giles (1 Chand., 112.) It was there held by the unanimous judgment of the court that in the absence of a statute declaring it so, the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers; and that in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number would not be thereby elected."—(Opinion, 498.)

1867. Commonwealth vs. Cluley (56 Penna., 270):

"The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities. They cannot be rejected by the inspectors, or thrown out of the count by the return judges. The disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal. Even in England it has been held that votes for a disqualified person are not lost or thrown away so as to justify the presiding officers in returning as elected another candidate having a less number of votes, and if they do so a quo warranto information will be granted against the person so declared to be elected, on his accepting the office. (See Cole on Quo Warranto, 141–2; Regina vs. Hiorns, 7 Ad. & E., 960; 3 Nev. & Perry, 184; Rex vs. Bridge, 1 M. & S., 76.) Under institutions such as ours are there is even greater reason for holding that a minority candidate is not entitled to the office if he who received the largest number is disqualified. We are not informed that there has been any decision strictly judicial upon the subject, but in our legislative bodies the question has been determined. It was determined against a minority candidate in the legislature of Kentucky, in a case in which Mr. Clay made an elaborate report and was sustained. In 1793 Albert Gallatin, elected a Senator from this State, was declared by the Senate of the United States disqualified because he had not been a citizen of the United States nine years, and his election was declared void for that reason, but his seat was not given to his competitor. Nobody supposed the minority candidate was elected. There have been several other cases of contested elections in which the successful candidates were decided to have been disqualified, and denied their offices. John Bailey's case is one of them. He was elected to Congress from Massachusetts, and refused his seat in 1824. But neither in his case, nor in any other with which we are acquainted, were the votes given to the successful candidate treated as nullities, so as to entitle one who had received a less number of votes to the office. There is a class of cases in England apparently, but not really, asserting otherwise."—(Opinion of the court by Strong, J.)

This able opinion by Judge Strong, now on the Supreme Bench of the United States, is well worth careful consideration. Your committee would call special attention to that sentence where it is stated that "the disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal." The act of Congress prescribing the time and manner of electing Senators specifies what the vote shall be for in order to make it available in the count; for it says "each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator." The vote must be for a person, not a blank in fact, not for a myth, but for a person. But if the vote is cast for a person for Senator in Congress from that State, this statute has been formally complied with, and no construction can change the fact. Vance is a person; 63 viva voce votes in the House and 32 viva voce votes in the Senate were given for him for Senator in Congress from North Carolina on the day and at the place required. Then the provisions of the act of July 25, 1866, have been strictly and formally complied with. What power, then, has the Senate of the United States, or any court, to declare these votes were never cast for a person? For this, it seems to your committee, must be said before the memorialist could be entitled to the seat he claims. But even this conclusion must result in a decision adverse to his claim; for if these votes are declared nullities, then no quorum voted. (Also Saunders vs. Hayes, 13 Col., pages 145, 156; 10 Col., Whitman vs. Maloney.)

Secondly. The legislative decisions are against the idea that the English law obtains in this country. So far as any action has been taken in the Senate which bears upon the question, it has been decidedly against the English law.

In the case of Mr. Gallatin, from Pennsylvania, in 1793, although deciding him to be ineligible and his election void, yet, by resolution, the governor of that Commonwealth was simply notified of this action.—(Cont. El. Cong., page 859.)

The case of Yulee vs. Mallory, of Florida, where blank votes were taken into the count.—(Cont. El. Cong., from 1834 to 1865, page 608.)

The cases of Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, and Miller, of Georgia, where the oath of office was modified, is a declaration on the part of the Senate of the American rule.

In the House of Representatives the same rule has so far prevailed.

The case of Mr. Bailey, of Massachusetts, 1824, where the candidate receiving the highest vote was declared ineligible, yet the votes given to him, as Judge Strong remarks in the case of Cluley, "were not treated as nullities."—(Cont. El. from 1789 to 1834, page 254.)

The case of Smith vs. J. Y. Brown, 1868, where the present question is ably discussed in the report by Mr. Dawes from the Committee on Elections, and it is decided that a minority cannot elect.—(Cont. El. from 1865 to 1871, page 395.)

In the case of McKee vs. J. D. Young, 1868, although the claim of the contestant was decided on other grounds, yet the opinion is reaffirmed that a minority cannot elect.—(Cont. El. from 1865 to 1871, page 422.)

The case of Christy vs. Wimpy is of a similar character.—(Cont. El., 1865 to 1871, page 464.)

Also the case of Jones vs. Mann, 1869.—(Cont. El., 1865 to 1871, page 471.)

The case of Wallace vs. Simpson, 1870, has been referred to as sustaining the English rule. But an examination of that case shows that it was decided on wholly different grounds. That the proposition "that when one of two candidates is ineligible the votes given for him are of no effect, and the other candidate is elected," was maintained by but one member of the subcommittee, Mr. Cessna, while it is expressly stated that the other two members, Mr. Hale and Mr. Randall, dissented from the proposition.—(Cont. El., 1865 to 1871, page 731.)

In the case of Zeigler vs. Rice, of Kentucky, 1870, it is decided that even where there is notice of ineligibility of the successful candidate this does not entitle the minority candidate to take his seat. The majority report of the committee in this case states:

"The committee are well satisfied that the acts of the contestee were well understood by the voters of said district at the time contestee was voted for, but do not agree with contestant that as contestee was ineligible, the candidate who was eligible is entitled to the seat."—(Cont. El., 1865 to 1871, page 884.)

The removal of disabilities by the action of Congress, of the same nature as these under which Vance labored, is a decision in the strongest possible terms that such votes are not nullities; that the election of such candidate is not void but voidable only. For if they were nullities, and the election of such candidate void, then Congress, by such action as it has taken, has elected members to one of its own houses without reference to the action of the people. As an example, we may refer to the case of R. R. Butler, of Tennessee (Contested Election Cases, 1855–'71, page 464); also case of Young, of Georgia.

But suppose that it is admitted that the English rule is applicable here, do the facts in this case bring it within that rule? Were the votes for Vance cast in willful obstinacy for a candidate the voters knew, or had good reason to believe, would not be entitled to take his seat? The memorialist avers that the fact that Vance was known to be ineligible is not controverted. That his ineligibility was a matter of public notoriety in North Carolina is doubtless true, and that it was known to most if not all of the members of the legislature is quite probable; yet no evidence has been presented to the committee proving this fact, or that notice of his disqualification was given at the time the vote was taken.

Let us even go one step further, and suppose that the evidence on this point was clear and explicit; are we not justified in believing that those who voted for Vance did so in good faith, believing that his disabilities would be removed after the election by the action of Congress, basing this presumption on the precedents which had recently been set in similar cases? Nor is this by any means an improbable hypothesis, but accords much better with the facts presented to the committee than the hypothesis that the votes given for Vance were cast in "willful obstinacy" for a candidate they knew would not be admitted to his seat. If they were given under the impression that these disabilities would be removed, then, although unavailing, they cannot be rejected from the count. And the committee would again refer to the report of the committee in the case of Yulee vs. Mallory, of Florida, 1852, where the following language is used which is applicable to this view of this case:

"If blank votes are beyond a doubt a nullity; if the resolution is to be regarded of no effect, and we are brought to the question, under these circumstances, whether Mr. Yulee is duly elected, it seems to us difficult to maintain the affirmative of that proposition upon the facts before us. If the members were misled on both these material points by assuming that their previous doings afforded safe and certain rules of action, then they were misguided by what they had a right to consider as authority, and must have acted under a misconception of right, which stood, as they supposed, unquestioned. If this be so, they stand substantially in the condition of an elector who votes for a person disqualified, believing him to be qualified. The vote in such case, though unavailing, is not rejected from the count."—(Senate Election Cases, page 223.)

Under the English rule, it is the fact that the voters knowingly and purposely throw away their votes that lays the foundation for saying they assent to the election of the minority man. But no such purpose can be predicated of the legislature of North Carolina. They did not know that their votes for Vance would be thrown away. They did not purposely throw them away, because Congress had in numerous cases previously removed disabilities of a similar character from those elected and allowed them to hold their offices. Nearly all of the officers elected in this State in 1868 had their disabilities removed by the act of June, 1868, and were allowed by virtue thereof to enter upon and discharge the functions of their respective offices.

The same act removed the disabilities of a large number of persons elected in Alabama in February, 1868, and at the close of the section contains this sweeping clause:

"And also all officers-elect at the election commenced the 4th day of February, 1868, in said State of Alabama, and who have not publicly declined to accept the offices to which they were elected."—(15 Stat. at Large, 366, 2.)

These were certainly sufficient to raise in the minds of the members of the legislature of North Carolina who voted for Vance the belief that his disabilities would be removed and that he would be allowed to take his seat. In fact, they had good right to believe that this was the rule, and the opposite the exception, especially where the persons so elected were known to favor the restoration of order and obedience to law.

Again, it may be fairly argued that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution did not disqualify Vance to be elected, but only to hold the office of Senator in case his disability should not be removed. Upon this interpretation his election was voidable only, and not void, and, as a consequence, Abbott was not elected. But even if this interpretation is erroneous, it is one the legislature of North Carolina might (and as nothing to the contrary is shown, we are to presume did) honestly entertain (especially in view of the action of Congress above referred to), and if they elected Vance under a mistake in law, his election was not void, but only voidable.

Although the committee have referred to the decisions of the courts and legislative bodies of this country bearing upon this case, the tenor of which is believed to be decidedly adverse to the claim of the memorialist, yet this appears unnecessary, as a careful examination of the act of Congress of July 25, 1866 (which has already been alluded to on one point), when applied to the facts in this case, would seem to be an effectual bar to the claim of the memorialist.

The first section of this act is as follows:

"That the legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress, in the place of such Senator so going out of office, in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from said State, and the name of the person so voted for who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journals of each house by the clerk or secretary thereof; but if either house shall fail to give such majority to any person on said day, that fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person shall have received a majority of all the votes in each house, such person shall be declared duly elected Senator to represent said State in the Congress of the United States; but if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for the purpose aforesaid, and a person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected; and in case no person shall receive such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and take at least one vote until a Senator shall be elected."

The passage of this act was evidently intended to be an exercise of that authority conferred upon Congress by Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, so far as the same relates to the election of Senator. This section provides that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The words "such regulations" in the latter clause refer to "the times and manner of holding elections" in the first clause ("places" being expressly excluded); therefore, by virtue of this provision, Congress has power—so far as the election of Senators is concerned—to prescribe the times and manner of holding elections. The act of July 25, 1866, is evidently intended to do this, and therefore has taken it out of the power of the legislatures of the States to determine either the times or manner of holding these elections so long as this act remains unrepealed.

In regard to the time fixed there is no difference of opinion. What then is prescribed in regard to the manner of holding the election in the first provision of the section? "Each house shall openly" do what? "Name one person for Senator in Congress from said State." How? "By a viva voce vote of each member present." If we give to each word of this clause its full force and effect, consistent with the other portions of the provision, what are we to understand by "each member present?" Does it signify those voting only, or has it some other meaning? If we refer to the second provision of the section we find the words "present" and "voting" both used in the same clause, showing clearly that the two are intended to have different significations. But it is insisted that if we give this construction to the provision of the act in relation to the election by the two houses, it is equivalent to saying that to obtain an election every member present must vote, thus placing it in the power of a single member so present to defeat an election on that day. If, on the other hand, it only applies to those voting, what force and effect do we give to these words?

It is manifest that the second provision of this section was intended to take it out of the power of a small majority in one house, by preventing an election, to defeat the election of a candidate in favor of whom there is a majority of the aggregate of the two houses, and as the usual method of proceeding is changed by this provision, it was necessary to prescribe what should constitute a quorum. A majority of all the members elected to both houses are required to be present to constitute this quorum, and the person elected is required to have a majority of all the votes of said joint assembly.

What shall constitute a quorum in each house on the day the vote is taken separately is left to the constitution and laws of the State. The constitution of North Carolina requires a majority of each house to be present; it follows that the provisions of the two parts of the section are substantially the same. For upon what grounds can we suppose that Congress would require a majority of a quorum on the second day to elect, and not on the first?

Your committee is therefore satisfied that Congress, in the passage of this act, contemplated and intended that in the election of Senators, whether under the first or second provisions of this section, to be valid, it should appear that a quorum was present and voting.

It is, moreover, evident from the very wording of this act that Congress did not even contemplate the possibility of an election by a minority under any circumstances, but by this act imply the opposite; for in the provision relating to the election by the two houses, separately, it is required that "the name of the person so voted for, who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, shall be entered on the journal of each house." This language is plain and easily understood. If any person receives a majority of the votes cast his name is to be entered on the journal; nothing is said of those in the minority; no evidence is to be preserved of the fact that they were known in the election; nothing is required to be said about the number of votes that even the successful candidate receives; the simple fact that Mr. A. received a majority of all the votes cast is all that is required. The next day the two houses shall convene in joint asssembly and compare journals, and if the same name and same fact in regard to him is on each, he is to be declared duly elected. But if neither candidate receives a majority the first day, the fact is to be entered on the journal; nothing more is required; no person has received a majority, and there is no use to preserve upon the record anything but that fact; yet it is possible that one out of three candidates may be known to be ineligible by those voting for him. If the second out of three candidates was disqualified, and those voting for him knew it, the case would be much more plausible than the present one. Yet this act contemplates no such contingency. Your committee is aware that this inference has no binding force; it is only alluded to to show that the idea of a minority candidate being entitled to his seat under any circumstances is at war with the very spirit of our laws and institutions, and that the principle involved in this case is at variance with the spirit of the law upon which the memorialist founds his claim to a seat.

It has been suggested that there is a distinction in respect to the operation of the rule insisted on by the memorialist, between a popular election, under our liberal system of suffrage, for a member to the House of Representatives by ballot and an election of a Senator by viva voce vote of the members of a legislature.

Your committee are inclined to think this is correct, but that the distinction bears against the claim of the memorialist instead of in favor of it.

The number of persons entitled to vote at a popular election is not fixed and definite, and hence it is impossible to have a quorum or anything answering thereto. There is no power to compel attendance. This is, and necessarily must be, wholly voluntary; therefore it is necessary that those attending should have the right to elect, where the election is free, and are prevented from attending by force, intimidation, or fraud. If a candidate receiving the majority is disqualified, and the votes cast for him are declared nullities (as claimed by the memorialist), the remaining votes are as effectual to elect as if every voter of the district had been present; and if those who voted for the candidate receiving the majority had not been present at all, the election nevertheless would have been valid. But the rule is wholly different in legislative bodies. The number is fixed and definite, a quorum can be and is required to act, and the presence of a less number is not effectual. Had but the thirty-two who voted for Abbott been present in the house at the time the vote was cast, we do not suppose any one would contend that he had even a shadow to base his claim upon; yet this number would be sufficient to elect in a district of a thousand voters if no others voted. We therefore coincide in the view that there is a difference, and that, even if the English rule was applicable in the case of an election of a member to the House of Representatives, it would by no means follow that it was applicable to the election of a Senator where the number voting, of the votes counted, is less than a quorum.

Your committee, therefore, after a full hearing of the case and examination of the authorities, come to the conclusion that the Hon. Joseph C. Abbott, of North Carolina, is not entitled to a seat in the United States Senate, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, not having received a majority of the votes cast by the North Carolina legislature on the second Tuesday in November, 1870, for the office of Senator of the United States, is not entitled to a seat in said United States Senate as such Senator.

O. P. MORTON.
JOHN A. LOGAN.
A. G. THURMAN.
JOSHUA HILL.

The following statement of Mr. Ransom, of North Carolina, is herewith presented with the report of your committee:

"Immediately after the election in North Carolina in 1870, which resulted in the triumph of the Democratic-Conservative party, the question of the election of a United States Senator became one of great, exciting interest throughout the State, and very soon assumed a sectional (State) character. Governor Vance, Governor Graham, and Judge Merrimon were the persons most prominently brought forward by the western gentlemen and papers. The "west" (of the State of North Carolina) insisted most earnestly that their section, of right, ought to have the Senator. Article after article was written in the western papers, claiming the Senator for the west, and there was great feeling on the question when, in November, 1870, the legislature met.

"Immediately on its meeting Mr. Jarvis, an eastern member, was elected speaker of the house, and this event gave western gentlemen still further ground to claim the Senator. Mr. Jarvis, in caucus, beat Mr. Welch and Colonel McAfee, both western gentlemen.

"The Democratic caucus met.

"Vance's, Merrimon's, Graham's, Warren's, and Ransom's names were before the caucus.

"The balloting at first was entirely indecisive.

"While the Democratic strength in the legislature was from 105 to 110, only 94 members attended caucus.

"On the eighth ballot Merrimon was ahead, receiving 35 votes; Vance and Ransom about 25 each, and Graham some 9 or 10.

"Merrimon's vote then declined and Graham's vote went up; when Ransom's strength was developed and his vote began to go up.

"The balloting continued, and finally, Ransom being ahead, Vance's vote went up on the twenty-sixth ballot, Ransom then having 42, Vance 39, about 10 for Graham, and 3 scattering, when Graham's friends, western men, went to Vance, and the last ballot was—for Vance, 48; Ransom, 46. Vance was nominated, the vote standing 48 for Vance and 46 for Ransom.

"After the twelfth ballot Ransom had been ahead of Vance until the twenty-sixth ballot, and on the twenty-seventh the Graham men went to Vance and elected him.

"There were about 35 Democrats from east of Raleigh, and about 70 or 75 west; but only 94 at caucus.

"Vance's great personal popularity accounts for his running ahead of Graham and Merrimon, both western men; and his popularity and position in the west, he living in the stronghold of the western Democracy, beat Ransom.

"Had Vance's disability been removed he would have beaten all his opponents without a struggle; while it is simple candor to say that Ransom would beat any other man except Vance. The last election proves this.

"Vance's nomination was then owing to his being a western man and his great personal popularity, both causes contributing to his nomination; his popularity beating Graham and Merrimon, and his position and popularity together beating Ransom.

"Merrimon had no disabilities.

"Graham was laboring under disabilities.

"DISABILITIES.

"Before the caucus met, and at the caucus, it was generally stated that Vance's disabilities would be removed and that he would be admitted. It was generally argued and believed that many influential Republicans of the North had assured Vance that his disabilities would be removed, and Vance himself expressed no doubt of it. His friends, by authority, stated in caucus that Vance would resign unless admitted.

"REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

"On the 20th of April, 1868, an election took place in North Carolina for all the State officers—governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, treasurer, judges of the supreme court, judges of the superior courts, the probate judges, members of the legislature, and all county officers, sheriffs, &c.

"On the 25th June, 1868, two months after this election, Congress removed the political disabilities of most of these officers, nearly all of whom were under disability when elected.

"Governor W. W. Holden and Mr. Thomas Ashe and Mr. D. R. Goodloe were the candidates for governor—Holden, Republican; Ashe, Democrat, and Goodloe, Republican. Goodloe was eligible, and he received only 300 out of 170,000 votes. The fact that he (Goodloe) only was eligible, and the others not, was fully discussed in the papers and canvass.

"On the 25th of June, as aforesaid, Todd R. Caldwell, lieutenant-governor, was also relieved.

"And so were Richmond Pearson, chief-justice; Robert P. Dick, associate justice; Thomas Settle, associate justice; Edwin G. Read, associate justice supreme court. And so with many of the judges of the superior courts: Daniel L. Russell, Anderson Mitchell, C. R. Thomas (now member of Congress), Judge Logan, &c.

"The superintendent of public works, C. L. Harris; W. L. Adams, auditor of public accounts; Joseph W. Holden, speaker of the house of representatives, and nearly every white member of the legislature of 1868, which actually elected Mr. Abbott to the Senate when he was admitted, and, as before said, nearly if not all of the county officers in the State—all, all had their disabilities removed after the election.

"And in the same act of June 25, 1868, it is declared in section 2, page 581 (Congressional Globe, part 5, 2d sess. 40th Cong.):

"'* * * And also all officers-elect at the election commenced the 4th day of February, 1868, in said State of Alabama, and who have not publicly declined to accept the offices to which they were elected.'

"This is the concluding sentence after the enumeration of a long list of persons in Alabama.

"GOVERNOR VANCE AND SENATOR POOL.

"About the 4th of March, 1871, great anxiety was felt by the legislature as to Vance's prospects, and Mr. Martin, member of the legislature from Carteret, introduced a resolution looking to Vance's resignation and another election. There was great interest on this question, and a caucus of the Democrats called with a view to settle the matter, when, on the 17th of March, 1871, Mr. Cowles, a senator in the North Carolina legislature, read from his place in the senate this letter from Hon. John Pool, now Senator in Congress, and this assurance quieted the legislature, and no action was taken.

"This letter is herewith presented.

"A. C. Cowles, esq., the senator from Yadkin County, recently wrote to Hon. John Pool at Washington in regard to the prospect of Governor Vance obtaining his seat, and received the following answer:

"'SENATE CHAMBER,
"'Washington City, March 17, 1871.

"'MY DEAR SIR: You ask me as an old friend to tell you candidly if Governor Vance is likely to be relieved. The Senate committee has just reported a bill for his relief, and it will pass next December, if not before. In the present state of things here it may not be acted upon this session, as Congress refuses to take up any business except some few special matters. But even at this disadvantage Vance stands a good chance of being relieved before we adjourn. Many Senators heretofore opposed will vote for him now. If Congress remains in session two weeks he will be relieved at this session. The House would pass the bill by an immense majority. I hardly have a doubt as to his final relief early in the next session.

"'I have not time to write more fully.

"'Very truly, &c.,

"'JOHN POOL.'"

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

FEBRUARY 28, 1872.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Carpenter asked and obtained leave of the Senate to present the following as the views of the minority:

A minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph C. Abbott, who claims to be entitled to a seat in this body as Senator from North Carolina, for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1871, respectfully submit the following report:

The gravity of the question now for the first time directly presented to the Senate, and the fact that the decision which shall be made in this case will be a precedent, render it desirable that the question should be fully considered; and believing that the conclusion arrived at by the committee is erroneous in law, we present to the Senate the reasons which have compelled us to dissent.

The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 5, provides:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

The duty cast upon the Senate by this provision of the Constitution is judicial in character. We may not inquire or consider what party interests demand; whether it would appear impartial to decide against a political friend, or whether a decision in his favor would be condemned in political circles. The question to be determined is one of strict right, depending upon legal principles, as settled by former decisions, parliamentary and judicial; and we have no more right than a judge upon the bench to turn away from the law to consider the political or partisan interests involved in the case or to be affected by the decision.

The case is this: On the 4th of March, 1871, the term of service of Joseph C. Abbott as Senator from North Carolina expired. On the second Tuesday of its session, in November, 1870, the day prescribed by law, the two houses of the legislature of North Carolina proceeded to the election of a Senator from that State for the succeeding term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, with the following result:

In the house of representatives:

	Votes.
Zebulon B. Vance received	63
Joseph C. Abbott received	32
Scattering	10
Members present	105

In the senate:

Zebulon B. Vance received	32
Joseph C. Abbott received	11
Scattering	5
Members present	48

these numbers constituting a quorum of each house of the legislature respectively.

On the following day the two houses, in the usual form, declared that Vance had received a majority of the votes in both houses, and was duly elected for the said term.

Had Vance been qualified to serve, there would be no question as to his right. But he was disqualified by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, for the reason that he had been a member of the Congress prior to the rebellion, and, as such member, had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and during the rebellion he had acted as colonel in the rebel army, and taken an oath of allegiance to the so-called Confederate States of America; and he had acted as governor of the rebel State of North Carolina from August, 1862, to April, 1865; and this disqualification was notorious—known to all the members of the legislature at the time of his election, and to all the people of that State. The fact that Vance was known to the members of the legislature who voted for him for Senator to be disqualified is not controverted. On the contrary, General Ransom, who claims to have been subsequently elected, upon the resignation of Vance, was heard before your committee, and frankly admitted that the fact that Vance was disqualified was well known to all the members of both houses of the legislature at the time of his pretended election.

It is admitted on all hands that the election which was held, as before stated, conferred no right upon Vance to a seat in this body; but Abbott, who was qualified, and who received the next highest number of votes cast, and a majority of all the votes cast for qualified candidates in both houses, insists that he was elected at said election, and is now entitled to the seat; and this is the question to be determined.

The Constitution, Article I, section 4, provides:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but Congress may at any time, by law, make and alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The election of Senators is thus, by the Constitution, committed to the regulation of the respective States, except so far as Congress, under this provision, may legislate upon the subject. The only act of Congress applicable is that of July 25, 1866, as follows:

"That the legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in place of such Senator so going out of office, in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from said State, and the name of the person so voted for who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal of each house by the clerk or secretary thereof; but if either house shall fail to give such majority to any person on said day, that fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place, as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person shall have received a majority of all the votes in each house, such person shall be declared duly elected Senator to represent said State in the Congress of the United States; but if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes cast in each house, or if either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for the purpose aforesaid, and a person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected; and in case no person shall receive such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and take at least one vote until a Senator shall be elected."—(U. S. Laws, vol. 14, page 253.)

This act was intended to assure the election of a Senator by the action of the two houses separately, or in case of a failure to elect in that mode, then by joint assembly of the two houses commencing on the following day and continuing day after day until a result should be reached. This act deserves a careful consideration, because it is insisted that the conclusions herein arrived at are in conflict with its provisions. In regard to election by the houses separately it is provided:

"Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from said State, and the name of the person so voted for who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal of each house by the clerk or secretary thereof."

It will be perceived that this act does not attempt to determine what shall be a quorum of each house, but leaves that question to be determined by the constitution and laws of the State. By the constitution of North Carolina it is provided:

"Neither house shall proceed upon public business unless a majority of all the members are actually present."

It is not necessary that all the members should participate in the transaction of public business by either house, but merely that a majority of all the members should actually be present in each house. But in providing for an election by the joint assembly of the two houses the act of Congress does provide that in such election—

"The person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected."

The difference in these two provisions is not one of phraseology merely, but of substance. In the election by the two houses separately in North Carolina, if a majority of the members elected to each house are actually present, the person who shall receive the highest number of votes cast, though that may be less than half of a constitutional quorum, is to be declared elected; but in the election by the joint assembly it is not enough that a candidate should receive a majority of all the votes cast, but he must receive a majority of "all the votes of the said joint assembly—a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting." These provisions are so materially different that the variation cannot be regarded as accidental, and the reason for the distinction is, no doubt, that the act intended to leave the matters of a quorum and the proceedings of the houses acting separately to be regulated by the constitution and laws of the State, but the act intended to provide what should be necessary to constitute a quorum and make an election in the joint assembly—a body created by the act, and whose proceedings might not be regulated by the constitution of the State.

It is only necessary in this case to consider the effect of the proceedings in the two houses on the first day, because it is upon those proceedings Mr. Abbott founds his claim.

If he was legally elected on that day the subsequent proceedings by the joint assembly could not affect his right, nor can such claim be affected by any subsequent proceedings of the legislature. His claim depends upon the legal effect of what took place in the two houses on the first day of the election.

It is insisted that the provisions of the act in relation to election by the two houses and by the joint assembly are substantially the same, because it is provided by the act that—

"Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator, &c., and the name of the person so voted for who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal," &c.

And hence it results that to be elected on the first day the person must have a majority of all the members present. But this construction, which is equivalent to saying that, to make an election, every member must vote, would put it in the power of a single member of the legislature to defeat an election on that day. This could not have been intended, and that clause must be regarded as relating merely to the manner of voting; and if a number of votes are cast for a qualified candidate, and the other members refuse to vote at all, then the person "who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast" must be deemed elected.

The provision concerning the joint assembly is materially different. There it is provided:

"The joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for the purpose aforesaid, and a person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected."

The clause "a person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting," undoubtedly requires that to make an election a candidate must receive a number of votes greater than half of the majority of both houses. The difference between the two provisions is this: if a majority or quorum of each house are actually present when each house proceeds to the election on the first day, the person receiving the highest number of votes cast is elected, though receiving less than half of a majority. But in the joint assembly it is necessary to an election that a candidate should receive the votes of more than half of a majority of both houses.

It is a well-established rule for construing statutes that every clause, phrase, and word must be deemed to have been added to the statute for the purpose of accomplishing some end that would not be accomplished without it.

Dwarris on Statutes (Potter's edition, 1871), 198, says:

"It is a safe method of interpreting statutes to give effect to the particular words of the enacting clauses. For when the legislature in the same sentence uses different words the courts of law will presume that they were used in order to express different ideas. So, if there be a material alteration in the language used in the different clauses, it is to be inferred that the legislature knew how to use terms applicable to the subject-matter. 'The several inditing and penning of the different branches,' said the judges in Edrick's case, 'doth argue that the maker did intend a difference of the purviews and remedies.'"

To the same effect, see Rex vs. Bolton (5 Barn. and Cres., 74).

Applying this familiar precept to the statute before us, it must be held that the provision in regard to an election by the joint assembly requiring a person to receive "a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly," which is not found in the act in relation to an election by the two houses acting separately, was added for the purpose of requiring in one case what was not necessary in the other. It may be said that the same thing ought to be required in the one case as in the other, and that the act of Congress ought not to be so construed as to permit an election by the minority in one case and to forbid it in the other. But the answer to this is obvious. Before the passage of this act the States elected Senators by various methods; some by a joint assembly of both houses and some by the action of the two houses separately. In those States which elected by the latter method the houses might sometimes disagree, and thus defeat an election. It was the manifest intention of the act of Congress to afford to a legislature the opportunity of electing a Senator by the separate action of the houses, and in doing so to leave the whole detail of the election to be regulated by the parliamentary usage of the State. But in providing for an election by the joint assembly, a method not in use in some of the States, it was necessary to provide what should be a quorum, and what should be necessary to an election.

As the act of Congress does not affect the question under consideration, resort must be had to the precedents and authorities, English and American.

It is admitted that when the electors vote for a disqualified candidate, in ignorance of his disqualification, the election is void, and must be remitted to the elective body.

But it is insisted that where, as in this case, the electors (the members of the two houses) had full knowledge of the disqualification, votes cast for such person are considered as thrown away, and the qualified candidate receiving the next highest number of votes, and a majority of all votes cast for qualified candidates, is elected. If this proposition is well grounded, Mr. Abbott is entitled to a seat; and this is the precise question upon which we are to consult the authorities.

Mr. Abbott furnished to your committee a printed brief containing references to and quotations from the decisions upon this question from the earliest times, which quotations are embodied in this report.

Rogers on Elections (ed. 1847, ch. 7) says:

"The principle upon which courts of law have acted in such cases is broad and uniform, and is thus laid down, and the authorities all cited by Lord Ellenborough in pronouncing the judgment of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Rex vs. Hawkins (A. D. 1808), 10 East, 211, which judgment was affirmed upon appeal to the House of Lords (2 Dow, 124).

"The general proposition that votes given for a candidate after notice of his being ineligible are to be considered the same as if the person had not voted at all is supported by the cases of The Queen vs. Boscawen, E. T., 13 Anne, 1713; The King vs. Withers, E. T., 8 Geo. II, 1835; Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, M., 15 Geo. II, 1742, all of which are cited in Cowper, 537, in King vs. Monday (A. D. 1777). In the first, Boscawen and Roberts, the two candidates, had an equal number of votes, but because Boscawen was incapable, the votes given for him were considered as thrown away, and the other duly elected. In the second case, Withers had five votes out of eleven, and the other six refusing to vote at all, the court held Withers duly elected, and the six who refused to vote were virtually consenting to the election of Withers. In the third case, Taylor, Biggs, and Kingston were candidates. Biggs was objected to as a disqualified person, notwithstanding which Biggs had 14 votes, Taylor 13, and Kingston only 1. Then Lord Chief-Justice Lee, at nisi prius, directed the jury that if they were satisfied that the electors had notice of Biggs's want of qualification they should find for the plaintiff (Taylor), because Biggs, not being qualified, was to be considered as a person not in esse, and the voting for him a mere nullity. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the court, on a motion for a new trial, agreed with the law as laid down by Lord Chief-Justice Lee, and refused a new trial. The same principle has been acted on in the case of Claridge vs. Evelyn (1821), 5 B. and A., 81, where an infant, having been elected to the office of clerk of a court of requests, notice was given at the time of his election of his ineligibility on the ground of nonage. An action was brought for a false return by the unsuccessful candidate, and a verdict given for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court of King's Bench. At the close of his judgment, after argument, Abbott, C. J., said: 'I am of opinion, therefore, that he (the infant) was ineligible; and due notice of his incapacity having been given to the electors at the time of his election, their votes were thrown away, and consequently there must be judgment for the plaintiff.' (Vide also R. vs. Coe., Haywood on County Elections. 538; R. vs. Parry & Phillips (1787), 14 East, 549; R. vs. Bridge (1811), 1 M. & S., 76.)

"Fife, 1 Luders, 435 (A. D. 1785–'90): General Skene was elected. Mr. H. gave notice at the poll that General Skene was incapacitated by reason of holding the offices of baggage-master to the forces and inspector of the roads, and petitioned upon those objections. The committee seated Mr. Henderson, on the ground that the novel creation of one of the offices was notorious and within Anne, c. 7, s. 625 (a).

"Cockermouth (1717), 18 Journ., 673: The votes were, for Sir Wilfred Lawson 90, for Lord Percy Seymore 84. The former had been proved at the election to be under twenty-one years of age. The House seated Lord Percy Seymour.

"Flintshire, 1 Peck, 526 (1802–1806): The facts and decisions the same as in the case of Cockermouth.

"Second Southwark (Clifford, 130, 1796): The former committee having resolved, 'that at the last election for the borough of Southwark G. W. Thellusson, esq., did act in violation of the statute of the 7 W. III, c. 4, whereby he is incapacitated to serve in Parliament upon such election,' and notice having been given of this resolution, the petitioner was seated with a minority of votes.

"Second Canterbury (Clifford, 353): The first committee merely declared that neither of the sitting members was duly elected, and that the election was void. The second committee found specially that the first election was declared void for bribery and corrupt practices only; and having heard evidence that notice was given at the election of the ineligibility of the sitting members on account of bribery and corruption at the former election, and that copies of the opinions of three counsel, all stating that the sitting members were ineligible, were read, seated the petitioners with the minority of votes. (Kirkcudbright, 1 Luders, 72 ante, 72 et seq.; Radnorshire, 1 Peck, 496; Leominster, 1 C. & D., 12; and 2 Dungarvon case K. & Ambl., 6).

"Leominster (1827), C. & D., 1: Objection made that the candidate had declined to take the qualification oath when requested so to do. His return declared void and the petitioner seated."

Haywood on County Elections, 535, says:

"It must be remembered, however, that in case a candidate laboring under disabilities should be returned, the election will be avoided on petition; and that if, before the election comes on, or a majority has polled, sufficient notice has been publicly given of his disability, the unsuccessful candidate next to him on the poll must ultimately be the sitting member. * * * When the disability of the candidate is notorious, it should seem that it was not necessary to give notice to the electors."

Roe on Elections (ed. 1818), page 256, says:

"If there be no other candidate than the person incapacitated, the election will necessarily be void; but if, besides such incapacitated person, there be also one or more candidates, it is a very important question whether, in consequence of the incapacity of the former, the electors are to be called upon to reconsider their choice, or whether they are to be represented by the second in number upon the poll, he in reality being regarded the first by reason of the nullity of the franchise given to the other candidates. It will be seen that the latter proposition is that which constitutes the law in cases where misapplication of the franchise by the electors was willful, and therefore made in their own wrong."

Male on Elections, 336, says:

"If the election is made of a person or persons ineligible, such election is void either in toto or of one only, according as the ineligibility applies to all or one only, where that ineligibility is clear and pointed out to the electors at the poll. It has been held that the votes given to such ineligible candidate, after notice, are thrown away, and a competitor, though chosen by a smaller number of electors, has in such case been held duly elected.

"But such ineligibility ought to be clear, and grounded upon some known and settled rule of law. The same doctrine holds at law in the election to offices in which, after notice of the ineligibility of any particular candidate, the votes given to him are held to be thrown away."

Clerk on Elections, page 156, says:

"Whenever a candidate is disqualified from sitting in Parliament, and notice thereof is publicly given to the electors, all the votes given for such disqualified candidate will be considered as thrown away, and the other candidate, with a minority of votes, will be in position to claim the seat on proof of the existence of the disqualification, and that sufficient notice has been given of it to the electors."

2 Kyd on Corporations, 12, says:

"Two requisites are necessary to make a good election: 1. A capacity in the electors. 2. A capacity in the elected. And unless both concur the election is a nullity. With respect to the capacity of the electors, their right is this: They cannot say there shall be no election, but they are to elect; therefore, though they may vote and prefer one to fill an office, they cannot say such a one shall not be preferred; or by merely saying we dissent to every one proposed, prevent any election at all. Their rights consist in an affirmative, not a negative declaration. Consequently, there is no effectual means of voting against one man but by voting for another; and even then, if such other person be unqualified, and the elector has notice of his incapacity, his vote will be thrown away."

Grant on Corporations, 109, says:

"When the ineligibility of a candidate arises from his holding or having held a public office, the people within the jurisdiction of such office are held in law to know and are chargeable with notice of such ineligibility."

And on page 208 he says:

"A disqualification, patent or notorious, at once causes the votes given for the candidate laboring under it to be thrown away."

Arnold on Corporations, 141, says:

"The general rule may be stated thus: If a candidate for an office is ineligible at the time of the election by reason of any disqualification, and public notice of such disqualification is given at the election, all votes given for that candidate after such notice are thrown away; and if there are other eligible candidates, the one who has the largest number of votes will be duly elected."—(Vide R. vs. Hawkins, &c.)

In King vs. Parry (in 1811), 14 East., 559, it was ruled:

"When a candidate is disqualified for sitting in Parliament, and notice thereof is given to the electors, all votes given for such candidate will be considered thrown away, and the other candidate, with a minority of votes, will be in a position to claim the seat on proof of the existence of the disqualifications."

In Rex vs. Blissell, upon a motion for a new trial, Lord Mansfield, interrupting counsel for the Crown, who was arguing that the disqualification was not notorious, said:

"Do you doubt that, if he is really disqualified, whether such disqualification is notorious or not, the votes given for him are thrown away? In another jurisdiction, if the disqualification is notorious, it does more—it elects the other party; and of the law in this case you can have no doubt."—(Vide Heywood on Elections, 533–537.)

In confirmation of this rule, we have a decision that to vote knowingly for a disqualified candidate is equivalent to not voting at all. In the case of Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, quoted above—

"All the judges held that the verdict was right. They held that, as the fourteen electors who voted for Biggs had notice that he was not qualified, their votes were thrown away; that when electors vote for a person not qualified it is the same thing as if they had given no votes at all, in which case it was not disputed that silence was a constructive consent."

In Queen vs. Coaks (1855), 28 Eng. L. and E., 307, Lord C. J. Campbell said:

"Now, it is the law—both the common law and parliamentary law—and it seems to me also common sense, that if an elector will vote for a man who he knows is ineligible, it is as if he did not vote at all, or voted for a non-existent person; as it has been said, as if he gave his vote for the man in the moon."

In Oldknow vs. Wainwright (2 Burr., 1017), it was held that if a majority dissent from an election, but vote for nobody else, the election by the minority is good. This case related to an election of town clerk by mayor, aldermen, and common council. Whole number of electors 25, of whom, after due notice, 21 assembled. Nine electors voted for Seagraves, while 11, protesting against any election at that time, refused to vote. As to the election of Seagraves, Lord Mansfield held:

"Whenever electors are present and do not vote at all, they virtually acquiesce in the election made by those who do."

In King vs. Monday (2 Cowp., 538), Lord Mansfield said:

"Upon the election of a member of Parliament, or a verderor, where the electors must proceed to an election, because they cannot stop for that day or defer it to another time, there must be a candidate or candidates; and in that case there is no way of defeating the election of one candidate proposed but by voting for another."

In Southwark (Elections, 259), it is said—

"That it is willful obstinacy and misconduct in a voter to give his vote for a person laboring under a known incapacity."—(See also Willcock, Cor., 215, 1827.)

See also Regina vs. Hiomes, 3 Nevill and Perry, 48, 1839; S. C., 7 Adolph. and E., 960; and Regina vs. Pancras, 1857, 7 Ellis and B., 954.

In Gosling vs. Veley, decided in 1848, 7 Q. B. R., 437, Lord Dunnan, C. J., delivering the judgment of the court, after citing cases, said:

"Where an elector, before voting, receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise; and, therefore, however strongly he may in fact dissent, and in however strong terms he may disclose his dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted; that is, the helping to the election of some other person. He is present as an elector; his presence counting as such to make up the requisite number of electors where a certain number is necessary; but he attends only as an elector, to perform the duty which is cast on him by the franchise he enjoys as elector; he can speak only in a particular language; he can do only certain acts; any other language means nothing; any other act is null; his duty is to assist in making an election. If he dissents from the choice of A, who is qualified, he must say so by voting for some other also qualified; he has no right to employ his franchise merely in preventing an election, and so defeating the object for which he is empowered and bound to attend. And this is a wise and just rule in the law. It is necessary that an election should be duly made, and at the lawful time; the electoral meeting is held for that purpose only; and but for this rule the interest of the public and the purpose of the meeting might both be defeated by the perverseness or corruption of electors who may seek some unfair advantage by postponement. If, then, the elector will not oppose the election of A in the only legal way, he throws away his vote by directing it where it has no legal force; and in so doing he voluntarily leaves unopposed, i. e., assents to the voices of the other electors. * * * It follows from these observations that the true ground of the decision is that stated by Lord Mansfield in the case first cited: 'Whenever electors are present and do not vote at all they virtually acquiesce in the election made by those who do.' * * * In case of Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, the counsel, in argument, took the distinction between not voting at all and voting for the disqualified candidate. They admitted that silence might well be held to give consent, but that voting for the other candidate was an express negative; it was the only way, they said, of voting against one to vote for the other. But the court overruled the distinction. To vote for a person not qualified, they said, was the same thing as not to vote at all, which, it was admitted, would have been a constructive assent. It will not escape observation that, in all these cases, the law required the concurrence of a majority of the electors present to make the election good. In none of them could it be stated as a tenable proposition that the minority could bind the majority, or make a good election against their votes. In all of them, too, the numerical majority were de facto opposed to the election made. Yet this fact was never considered as rendering the election in law other than by an actual majority."

Cushing's Lex Parliamentaria states the rule as follows:

"Section 111. Of elections of, and votes given for, disqualified persons.

"175. If an election is made of a person who is ineligible, that is, incapable of being elected, the election of such person is absolutely void, even though he is voted for at the same time with others who are eligible and who are accordingly elected (see Male on Elections, 336); and this is equally true whether the disability is known to the electors or not; whether a majority of all the votes or a plurality only is necessary to the election; and whether the votes are given orally or by ballot.

"176. The principle above applies equally where the constitution or law points out, among other eligible persons, the particular candidates to be voted for; in which case votes given for other persons are void. Thus the constitutions of Maine and Massachusetts, providing that, in case of a failure to elect senators at the general election, the deficiency shall be supplied on the day of the meeting of the legislature by such senators as shall be elected and the members of the other branch from among the persons voted for and not elected as senators. All votes given on such occasions for any other than the candidate designated by law, though otherwise eligible, are thrown away.

"177. In England, where a plurality only is necessary to an election, and where the votes are given orally, it is also held that if electors have notice of the disqualification of a candidate, every vote given for him afterward will be thrown away and considered as not having been given at all. (King vs. Monday, Cowper's Reports, 537; Rex vs. Hawkins, 10 East's Rep., 211, and cases there cited; 2 Dow's Rep., 124; Claridge vs. Evelyn, 5 Barnewall and Ald. Rep., 81; Rex vs. Coe, Heywood on County Elections, 538; Douglas's Rep., 398, n.; Rex vs. Blissell, Heywood, 537; Rex vs. Parry, 14 East, 549; Rex vs. Bridge, 1 Maule and Selwyn's Rep., 76.) The effect of this rule is that not only will the election of a disqualified person be held void, but if such election takes place after notice of the disqualification is given to the electors, the candidate having the next highest number of votes will be elected. (Fife, 1 Luders, 455; Cockermouth, 18 Commons Jour., 672; Flintshire, 1 Peckwell, 526; Southwark, 2 Clifford, 130; Canterbury, 2 Clifford, 353; Kirkcudbright, 1 Luders, 72; Radnorshire, 1 Peckwell, 496; Leominster, Corbet, and Daniel, 1; Leominster, Rogers, App. IX; Cork County, Knapp and Ambler, 406; Belfast, Falconer, and Fitzherbert, 603; Rogers on Elections, 224. See also Male on Elections, 336; and Abington, 1 Douglas, 419.) This doctrine, however hard it may seem, is founded in the familiar principle that every man is bound to know the law with reference to any act which he undertakes to do; and consequently that when an elector is apprised of the fact of disqualification of a candidate, and notwithstanding gives his vote for him, the elector takes upon himself the risk of losing his vote, if his construction of the law turns out to be wrong. (Rogers on Elections, 226.)

"178. In this country it is equally true that the election of a disqualified person is absolutely void; and in those States where a plurality elects and where the votes are given orally, as in England, votes given for a candidate after notice of his disqualification are thrown away, and the candidate having the next highest number of votes is elected.

"179. In reference to elections by ballot, in which secrecy is the distinguishing feature, and in which, consequently, neither the returning officers nor the electors themselves are supposed to know for whom the votes are given until the result is declared, it seems not unreasonable to consider the votes for ineligible candidates to be thrown away in all cases, and the opposing candidate elected, where the electors know, or must be presumed to know, the disability; and in all cases where there is no such actual or presumed knowledge to hold the whole proceeding merely void.

"180. In reference to elections in which an absolute majority is requisite to a choice, and in which, consequently, the whole number of votes received is first to be ascertained, votes given for ineligible persons must of course be excluded from the enumeration, for the reason that as the whole balloting would be void and all the votes excluded if they were all for such candidates, it would be preposterous to enumerate such votes where they constitute a part only of the votes given in. If, in consequence of such exclusion, the result of the election would be different from what it would otherwise be, the whole proceeding must perhaps be held void or valid according as the electors have actual or personal knowledge of the ineligibility of the persons for whom the excluded votes are given."

To the same effect see Wilson's Digest of Parliamentary Law, pages 107–114.

Angell and Ames on Corporations, page 98, n. 3, say:

"If the assembly be duly convened, and the majority vote for an unqualified person, after notice that he is not qualified, their votes are thrown away, and the person having the next majority, and not appearing to be disqualified, is duly elected."

This subject has been discussed at different times in the legislature of Massachusetts, and it has been uniformly decided that votes given for candidates constitutionally ineligible should be regarded the same as blank votes. In 1843 an effort was made to change this parliamentary rule, and a majority of the committee submitted a report, accompanied by a resolution, to the effect that it was "not in accordance with the constitution and laws for the two branches of the legislature to reject in making up the count the ballots cast for ineligible candidates." A minority of the committee submitted an adverse report, saying:

"The fact that the votes given for ineligible candidates, when the two houses have met in convention for the purpose of filling vacancies in certain offices, have been rejected from the count, is of long standing; and that no evil has resulted from such practice is of itself a sufficient reason why a different rule should not be established. It is time enough to provide a remedy when an evil is found to exist, and not in anticipation of an evil. This it is believed is a safe course in all cases. * * * The practice of rejecting blank pieces of paper, although they may have the form and shape of the actual votes which are cast, is believed to be uniform everywhere. The reason for the rejection of such paper is that it is not a voice given and numbered; that no one is designated who can be elected.

"It is, however, no less an expression of dissatisfaction to the candidate voted for by other persons, on one side or the other, than it would be if it bore the name of an imaginary being or a person ineligible. In both cases it is not a vote and should not so be treated. So far as precedents can be found, the practice of rejecting from the count votes cast for an ineligible candidate is not peculiar to the convention of the two houses in the Massachusetts legislature. It has obtained more or less in the House of Representatives of the United States and in the House of Commons in Great Britain. * * * Inasmuch as the custom has obtained, for aught that appears, from time immemorial to reject such votes, the undersigned take leave to submit that the proposed resolution of the majority of the committee is uncalled for, and that no further action be had on such order."

The house laid the resolution of the majority on the table, thus in effect adopting the report of the minority.—(Cushing's Reports of Contested Elections in Massachusetts, page 499.)

The subject was again discussed, and the decision reaffirmed, that votes cast for ineligible candidates should be thrown away. In 1849 Mr. Slade was returned as the duly elected representative of the town of Somerset, and his seat was contested for the reason, among others, that a ballot for Nathaniel Morton, of Taunton, for member of Congress, was thrown out by the judges of election.

The committee, in their report declaring Mr. Slade lawfully entitled, discussed this question as follows:

"The policy of the law requires that such a construction should be put upon all proceedings at elections as to make such proceedings valid rather than nugatory. An election is always attended with trouble, inconvenience, and expense, and should not be set aside for light or frivolous causes. If votes cast by mistake for persons not eligible are to be counted, then the intention and will of the voter is defeated; if, on the other hand, such votes are willfully put into the ballot-box, the person who thus votes indicates so clearly his disregard of the value of the elective franchise that it is only a deserved punishment for his delinquency to deprive his vote of all weight and influence at such election. By so doing a voter is not deprived of any legitimate exercise of his right, because he can always manifest his opposition to any one candidate by voting for some other.—(Rex vs. Monday, Cowper, Lord Mansfield said the only way of voting against one was to vote for another.)

"Finally, it seems to the committee that there is no reason why a person who votes for an ineligible candidate should not be put upon the same footing with one who does not vote at all, as in both cases the parties show a disposition to prevent an election, and both of them show an unwillingness to perform their duty by aiding to promote those elections which are absolutely essential to the existence of the government. For if every voter refrained wholly from voting, or voted for an ineligible candidate, the result would be the same—no choice; and although it is true that no penalty is attached by law to a neglect of this obligation of voting, yet the obligation is not the less plain for that; and the committee believe it to be a duty too important to be neglected and too sacred to be trifled with by voting for fictitious persons or ineligible candidates. * * * The voter who puts into the ballot-box a blank piece of paper as clearly indicates his opposition to all the candidates as he who puts in a vote for an ineligible candidate; and there seems to be no reason why the opinion of the one should not be entitled to consideration as well as that of the other."—(Report agreed to April 10, 1849. See Cushing, Reports Contested Election Cases, Mass., page 576.)

In Indiana the same doctrine has been established by two decisions of the supreme court in the cases Gulick vs. New (14 Ind., 927) and Carson vs. McPhetridge (15 Ind., 327). In the former case the court say:

"It being conceded that the votes cast for Wallace were powerless and fruitless in effecting the main end arrived at—that is, in electing him—we are still asked to decide that they were so far effective as to prevent the election of any other person; that they were, so far as affirmative results were involved, thrown away, but that negatively they were operative We are reminded that in our form of government the majority should rule, and that if the course indicated is not followed a majority of the voters may be disfranchised, their voice disregarded, and their rights trampled under foot and the choice of a minority listened to. True, by the constitution and laws of this State the voice of a majority controls our elections, but that voice must be constitutionally and legally expressed.

"Even a majority should not nullify a provision of the constitution, or be permitted at will to disregard the law. In this are the strength and beauty of our institutions. Suppose a majority should persist in voting for a man totally ineligible to take the office of sheriff; what would be the result? As he could not hold the office, either the one capable of holding, receiving the next highest vote, would, as contended by the appellant, be entitled to the office, or there would be a vacancy, as insisted by the appellee. Suppose the proceedings should result in creating a vacancy; then it would remain, greatly to the detriment of public and private interests, or it would, under the statute, have to be filled by the action and choice of perhaps two men, which might be, possibly, in direct conflict with the choice of that majority in every respect. Then, while it is true that the votes of a majority should rule, the tenable ground appears to be that if the majority should vote for one wholly incapable of taking the office, having notice of such incapacity, or should perversely refuse, or negligently fail to express their choice, those, although a minority, who should legitimately choose one eligible to the position should be heeded. Suppose that eight years ago, at the first election under our new constitution, when nearly all the offices in the State were to be filled, a majority of the voters in the State, and in the several districts and counties, had voted for persons wholly ineligible to fill the several offices, would those offices have thereby remained vacant? Could that majority, by persevering in that course, have continued the anarchy which might have resulted from such action? Or, rather, is it not the true theory that those who act in accordance with the constitution and the law should control even a majority who may fail so to act? Whether the same reasoning should hold good where the ineligibility should arise out of some cause other than a constitutional prohibition is a question we are not now called upon to decide."

The majority of the court held that the voter must take notice of the disqualification of the candidate, and that votes cast for a candidate in fact disqualified must be thrown out, whether the voters knew of the disqualification or not. Judge Perkins dissented upon this point, but affirmed the general doctrine, as follows:

"1. Where, at an election, there are opposing candidates for an office, and the candidate receiving the highest number of votes is ineligible, but, from a fact or cause which the voters did not and were not bound to know, the result is a failure, and gives no candidate a right to the office, and should be followed by another election.

"Probable examples, under this proposition, of cases where the voters might not have knowledge, viz, infancy of candidate, non-residency, want of naturalization, not of male sex, not of requisite degree of white blood, not in existence. This last was the fact in the case cited from 38 Maine R., app. There a portion of the people by mistake voted for a person not in being. The case of the State vs. Swearinger (12 Ga. R., 23) was a case of non-residency.

"2. Where the voters at the election do know, or are legally bound to know, so that, in law, they are held to know of the ineligibility of a candidate, the election does not result in a failure; but, in such case, the eligible candidate receiving the highest number of votes is legally elected and entitled to the office.

"Against this proposition we have not found a single authority. Those relied on as such by the court below were the cases in 38 Maine R. and 12 Ga., supra, and The State vs. Giles (1 Chand. Wis. R., 112.)

"Of the case in Maine, we have said enough above.

"Of the cases in Georgia and Wisconsin, it may be remarked that neither of them involved the point now under consideration, and what is said upon it is mere dicta, and neither of the cases cites a single authority.

"The point involved in the Georgia case was whether a certain corporate town in that State could elect to office in it a person not residing within the corporate limits, and it was held that it could. This closed the case.

"The point involved in the Wisconsin case was this: The constitution, article 6, section 4, provided that sheriffs should be ineligible for two years next succeeding the termination of their offices. A sheriff, in office at the time the constitution was adopted, was elected his own successor under the constitution; and it was held that he was legally elected; and that the disability imposed by the constitution related only to elections and terms held under the constitution. The decision of this point disposed of the case; and what is said beyond it, as in the Georgia case, if not improperly, but still is very loosely and carelessly said, and is not binding as authority.

"But while there are no authorities adverse to the second proposition above laid down, there is a cloud of them vindicating its correctness. As the attention of the court below does not appear to have been called to them, we shall here indicate where they may be found and examined.

"Mr. Grant, a late accurate English writer on corporations, at page 208, says: 'As has been stated, a disqualification, patent or notorious, at once causes the votes given for the candidate laboring under it to be thrown away; the same would probably be held to be the case where the electors had the means of knowledge of the candidates' qualification, or the contrary, and might have ascertained the facts if they had pleased.' Numerous cases are cited to sustain these positions.

"Judge Cushing, in his American work on the Law of Legislative Assemblies, at pages 66, 67, lays down the same doctrine as deducible from the decided cases.

"Where the same ineligibility of a candidate arises from his holding or having held a public office, the people within the jurisdiction of such office are held in law to know—are chargeable with notice—of such ineligibility; the votes given for such candidate are of no effect, and his highest eligible competitor is elected."—(Grant on Corp., supra, page 107; Biddle vs. Willard, 10 Ind. R., 62, on page 68.)

It is assumed that in general a certain number of persons less than a majority of a legislature, or any other legal elective body, is competent for the transaction of business. Speaking upon this point, Cushing's Lex Parliamentaria, section 247, says:

"This number may be precisely fixed in the first instance, or some proportional part established, leaving the particular number to be afterward ascertained, with reference to each assembly; and this may be done either by usage or by positive regulation; and if not so determined, it is supposed that a majority of the members composing the assembly constitute a quorum."

And we have before seen that, by the constitution of North Carolina, either house of the legislature may proceed to the transaction of public business, if a majority of the members-elect are present. And if a quorum are present there may be an election by such members as choose to vote. This point was decided in England in the case of Oldknow vs. Wainwright (2 Burr., 1017), and in this country in Commowealth vs. Green (4 Wharton, 531), where the court charge the jury as follows:

"When there is a quorum of members present, the moderator can only notice those who actually vote, and not those who do not choose to exercise their privilege of voting. 'Whenever,' says Lord Mansfield, 'electors are present and do not vote at all, they virtually acquiesce in the election of those who do.' And with this principle agrees one of the rules of the general assembly itself, which must be familiar to every member: 'Members (thirtieth rule) ought not, without weighty reasons, to decline voting, as this practice might leave the decision of very interesting questions to a small proportion of the judicatory. Silent members, unless excused from voting, must be considered as acquiescing with the majority.'

"This is not only the doctrine of the common law, of the written law, as you have seen, but it is the doctrine of common sense; for without the benefit of this rule it would be almost impossible, certainly very inconvenient, to transact business in a large deliberative assembly. * * * This, gentlemen, has been stigmatized as a technical rule of law, a fiction, and intendment of law. It is sufficient for us that it is a rule of law. We must not be wiser than the law. * * * Nor can we know anything of any fancied equity as contradistinguished from the law. The law is the equity of the case, and it must be so considered under the most awful responsibility by the court and the jury. In my opinion, a court and a jury can never be better employed than when they are vindicating the safe and salutary principles of the common law."

To the same effect, in the act of Congress before quoted, which declares that the person who shall receive a "majority of all the votes cast" shall be declared elected. Does this rule hold good in case of votes for a disqualified candidate, as well as in the case of members not actually voting? The unanimous opinion of the court in the case of Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, before quoted, was that—

"When electors vote for a person not qualified, it is the same thing as if they had given no votes at all; in which case it is not disputed that silence was a constructive consent."

In Regina vs. Coaks, before cited, Lord C. J. Campbell said:

"Now, it is the law, both the common law and parliamentary law, * * * that if an electcr will vote for a man who he knows is ineligible, it is as if he did not vote at all."

This question is also answered in the affirmative by an American work of standard authority, as follows:

"After an election has been properly proposed, whoever has a majority of those who vote, the assembly being sufficient, is elected, although a majority of the entire assembly altogether abstains from voting; because their presence suffices to constitute the elective body, and if they neglect to vote it is their own fault, and shall not invalidate the act of the others, but be construed an assent to the determination of the majority of those who do vote. And such an election is valid, though the majority of those whose presence is necessary to the assembly protest against any election at that time, or even the election of the individual who has the majority of votes; the only manner in which they can effectually prevent his election is by voting for some other qualified person."—(Angell & Ames on Corporations, ch. 4, sec. 6, and cases there cited; Brooks vs. Young, 12 Grattan, 303; State vs. Lehre, 7 Rich., 234; King vs. Monday, 2 Cowper, 537; Oldknow vs. Wainwright, 2 Burr., 1017; and Crawford vs. Powell, 2 Burr., 1016).

This is also in harmony with the act of Congress before quoted.

Inquiry has been suggested on the point whether, in the cases supposed, the person having the legal votes may be deemed elected, although the number of votes cast for him be less than the majority of a quorum.

To what has been above stated, and which may be applied to this question, the following additional reasons may be given to show that in law there is no sufficient ground for this objection:

First, in no one of the cases cited, either in argument of counsel or opinion of the judge, do we find that this point has been raised or suggested, as it seems probable it would have been had it been valid; or, second, we find at least two cases (King vs. Blissell and King vs. Monday) where, if this objection had been raised and sustained, it would have determined the case, but the point was not made. Third, in two cases the judges incidentally, but unequivocally, deny the truth of this objection.

In 14 East's Reports, page 599, note "d," on the case of Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath (M. 15, Geo. II.), it is said:

"Taylor moved a mandamus to be admitted into the office of a common councilman of the corporation of Bath.

"The defendant returned non fuit electus. * * * It appeared in evidence at the trial that, by the charter, the election of common councilmen is to be by the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, or the major part of them then present, and the mayor and twenty-seven aldermen being assembled for this purpose—Biggs had 14 votes, Taylor 13, and Kingston 1."

In 2 Cowper, 537, in reference to the above case, it is stated:

"Twenty-eight electors assembled; 14 voted for A (Biggs), 13 for B (Taylor), and 1 for C (Kingston). A was unqualified, and his incapacity known to the electors at the time."

Lee, chief-justice, in his directions to the jury said:

"That the votes given to A, with notice of his incapacity, were thrown away."

It afterwards came before the court (on motion for new trial), when Lee, C. J., compared it to voting for a dead man, and held that B, who had the 13 votes, was duly elected. And Justice Page (one of the court) said:

"That in such a case a minority of 2 only would have been sufficient to elect the other candidate."

And this where the "majority of a quorum" was 8.

The case of King vs. Blissell was a motion for a new trial on an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the defendant for acting as alderman at Portsmouth, and a verdict had been given for the Crown on two material issues. Pike and Blissell were adverse candidates. At the election the mayor only voted for Blissell, while three aldermen voted for Pike; but the mayor gave notice to the aldermen that Pike was incapacitated to be elected because he held the office of chamberlain, which was incompatible. Lord Mansfield, addressing the counsel for the Crown, who was arguing that the disqualification was not notorious, said:

"Do you doubt that, if he is really disqualified, whether such disqualification is notorious or not, that the votes given for him are thrown away? In another jurisdiction, if the disqualification is notorious, it does more—it elects the other party; but of the law in this case you can have no doubt."—(Heywood on Elections, page 533, and Wilson's Digest of Parliamentary Law, page 111.)

In this case 2 was a majority of a quorum, yet Lord Mansfield said if Pike was notoriously disqualified, Blissell, who received 1 vote, was elected, and "of the law in this case you can have no doubt."

An examination of the opinion of the judges in 25 Maine Rep., 567, throws light upon the above opinion. There the governor submitted the following questions:

1. Whether the governor and council in counting votes for county officers, under the statutes of that State, had power to receive from the town canvassers evidence to contradict the return made by them?

2. Whether the governor and council could receive an amended return from the town canvassers?

The judges, after citing the statutory provisions, answered as follows:

"The powers conferred upon the governor and council are specific and precise; and it is believed that it would be irregular to go beyond them, or in any manner to deviate from them. If they could receive evidence that the certificates were erroneous in one particular they might with equal propriety do so in another, and so exercise the powers of judges of those elections generally, and without restriction."

In other words the duty cast upon the governor and council was purely ministerial. They were to canvass the election from the returns and had no power to inquire beyond them. This was the ground upon which the opinion in the 38 Maine Rep. rested, as is evident from the fact that in the opinion in the 38th the judges refer to the opinion in the 25th Maine Rep. as conclusive of the questions then presented. In the opinion in 38 Maine the judges say the only duty cast upon the governor and council is to "open and compare" the copies of the records of the votes given, and from such comparison to ascertain and determine who had been elected. In other words, the statute did not make the governor and council the judges of the election, but merely cast upon them a specific ministerial duty, which performed, their power was at an end. This act had been performed by the former governor and council, who had declared that Abel C. Dinslow was elected. Consequently the then governor and council had no power to revise such former determination and declare that another was elected. And the precise and express ground upon which the opinion was given was that Dinslow having been elected, and there being no such man in existence, the office was vacant. It is evident that these opinions have no application to a case like the one under consideration, where the Senate is "the judge" of the election and is not restricted, as the governor and council in the Maine cases were, to a performance of the mere ministerial duty of declaring who appeared by the certificate to be elected.

Saunders vs. Haynes (13 Cal., 145), was a proceeding to contest the election of the defendant Haynes as judge of the district court for the eighth district in California.

The facts were these: Turner and Haynes were competing candidates at the election, and Turner received the larger number of votes, but the certificate was delivered to Haynes upon the assumption that Turner was ineligible because of his holding a lucrative office under the United States. The court held that Turner was not ineligible, and that, of course, ended the case and entitled Turner to the office. In the opinion of the court, it is said, obiter dictum, that if Turner had in fact been ineligible Haynes would not have been elected; and the case of State vs. Giles (1 Chand. Wis., 112) is cited as sustaining that principle. With the opinion and decision in Saunders vs. Haynes we fully concur. But the question involved in Mr. Abbott's claim to a seat, viz, that the electors knew the candidate to be disqualified, was not averred, and was not involved, because the fact did not exist in that case. The court held that Turner was not ineligible. Of course, the electors did not know a fact that did not exist.

Commonwealth vs. Cluley (56 Penn. St., 270), was a rule on the relation of McLaughlin against Cluley to show cause why a quo warranto should not issue against Cluley, to test his right to the office of sheriff of Allegheny County. At the election, October 9, 1866, Cluley received 19,915 votes and McLaughlin 12,925 votes for the office of sheriff. The suggestion rested upon the allegation that Cluley was ineligible at the time of the election, but it did not appear that the electors had notice of the disqualification; nor did it appear that, if the votes for Cluley were thrown out, McLaughlin was elected. The case turned upon the precise point that, inasmuch as it was not alleged that throwing out Cluley's votes, McLaughlin had a majority, therefore it did not appear that McLaughlin had such an interest in the question as would enable him to contest the election. It is true that the court, speaking obiter dictum in regard to a popular election by ballot, expressed the opinion that McLaughlin was not elected. But the court fully approve of the English rule, that at an election viva voce, by a limited number of electors, the votes given for a candidate known to be ineligible are thrown away.

The court says:

"There is more reason for this in England, where the vote is viva voce, and the elective franchise belongs to but few, than here, where the vote is by ballot, and the franchise well-nigh universal. In those cases the notice was brought home to almost every voter, and the number of electors was never greater then three hundred, and generally not more than two dozen. Besides, a man who votes for a person with knowledge that the person is incompetent to hold the office, and that his vote cannot, therefore, be effective, that it will be thrown away, may very properly be considered as intending to vote a blank, or throw away his vote.

"But the present relator suggests no such cause. He does not even aver that, if the votes given for Cluley were thrown out, he received a majority, though doubtless such was the truth. He has, therefore, exhibited no such interest as entitled him to be heard."

Without considering or quoting from the very able dissenting opinion of Chief-Justice Thompson in this case, we think it quite evident that the majority of the court have laid down principles upon which Abbott is entitled to his seat. Indeed, Abbott's case is precisely that in which, according to the opinion of the court, those who voted for Vance "may very properly be considered as intending to vote a blank, or throw away (their votes.") The election of Senator in North Carolina is made by two bodies, numbering, in the aggregate, less then two hundred, voting viva voce; and in this case those who voted for Vance voted viva voce for a person known by them to be disqualified.

These are the only American decisions supposed to conflict with the principle herein maintained which have been brought to the notice of your committee. In neither of these cases was the precise point now under consideration involved, and in no one of these cases is the principle of common and parliamentary law that a viva voce vote given for a person known by the elector to be disqualified is thrown away asserted, or even suggested to be unsound. On the contrary, in the Pennsylvania case, State vs. Cluley, as we have shown, the correctness and justness of this principle are expressly declared.

There are but two cases, so far as your committee are informed, in which the election of a Senator has been contested upon the ground of ineligibility at the time of the election—that of Gallatin from Pennsylvania and Shields from Illinois. And an examination of these cases will show that in neither of them was the point now made either involved or considered.

In Gallatin's case (1 Cont. Elec. in Congress, 854) the proof showed that when Gallatin was first mentioned as a candidate he expressed his opinion that his citizenship did not entitle him to be elected. Henry Kammerer testified that, at a meeting of some of the members of the legislature to agree upon a candidate for Senator, he heard Mr. Gallatin say:

"As for my name, it is out of the question; I have not been a citizen long enough to entitle me to serve in that station."

That at a second meeting it was stated, though not by Gallatin, that the doubt about his citizenship was then put to rights; and then it was almost unanimously agreed to put up Mr. Gallatin's name. Mr. Kammerer also stated the ground upon which Mr. Gallatin had at first supposed his citizenship did not entitle him to be a Senator. He says that the day after Gallatin's election he had a conversation with him, in which Gallatin said he had first declared himself ineligible "under a mistaken idea that it was necessary for him to have been nine years a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania; but that upon examining the Constitution he found that to have been nine years a citizen of the United States was sufficient, and that he had been above nine years a citizen of the United States, or words to that effect."

From this it is evident that at the time of his election Mr. Gallatin, and those by whose votes he was elected, believed that he had been for more than nine years a citizen of the United States. And although the Senate decided that he had not been a citizen of the United States for nine years prior to his election, and unseated him for that reason, yet it was nowhere suggested, either by proof or on the argument, that the electors knew him to be disqualified at the time they cast their votes for him.

Shields's case (Cont. Elec. in Congress, 1834 to 1865) is in all material respects like that of Gallatin. He had not, in fact, been nine years a citizen of the United States, and was unseated for that reason. But it was not pretended that the electors knew of his disqualification.

Therefore neither of these cases has any bearing upon the question now under consideration.

Your committee have also been referred to the case of Yulee vs. Mallory, same volume, page 608. In that case, on the first day of the election—January 13, 1851—the general assembly of the legislature of Florida met in convention of the two houses, and proceeded to vote viva voce for Senator. Twenty-nine votes were given for Yulee, and 29 votes were given for "blank." Thereupon the presiding officer declared no choice had been made. They then proceeded to a second and third vote, with substantially the same result. On the 15th of January they met again, and, on a call of the roll, thirty-one members responded "S. R. Mallory," and 27 votes were given to Yulee and others, whereupon the presiding officer declared Mallory to be duly elected. From this statement it might seem that Yulee's case raised the question now under consideration. But the brief, though very clear and able report of Mr. Bright, from the select committee in that case, shows the contrary. The two houses of the Florida legislature had, in 1845, passed a concurrent resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That a majority of all the members-elect composing the two houses of general assembly shall be necessary to determine all elections devolving upon that body."

Though the validity of this resolution was attacked by Mr. Yulee, the committee held that the resolution had been duly passed; that it had never been rescinded; that it was consistent with the Constitution of the United States empowering the legislature of a State to regulate the time, place, and manner of electing a Senator; and that it was conclusive against the right asserted by Yulee. And the resolution reported by the committee declaring that Mallory had been duly elected passed in the Senate without a dissenting vote.

In the report the committee, after determining that under the resolution of the legislature above quoted Yulee was not entitled to a seat, say:

"This being the view which the committee take of the case, there is no necessity for pursuing the subject further, since Mr. Yulee did not obtain votes sufficient to elect him."

The committee then notice the fact that the members of the legislature evidently voted upon the supposition that the resolution was valid, and say that—

"Even conceding the resolution to be invalid, yet the members in the election were misguided by what they had a right to consider as authority, and must have acted under a misconception of right which stood as they supposed unquestioned. If this be so, they stand substantially in the condition of an elector who votes for a person disqualified believing him to be qualified. The vote in such a case, though unavailing, is not rejected from the count.

"The only remedy which we can see for an election carried on through misapprehension from such well-founded causes is to set it wholly aside and open the way to a new choice; but in our view of the case there is no occasion to consider what ought to be done upon such a state of facts."

The distinction between votes cast with knowledge or in ignorance of the disqualification of the candidate voted for is inferable from the report in Yulee's case. And the doctrine maintained by that report, that an election carried on under honest misapprehension in regard to then existing facts ought to be set aside and a new election ordered, is conceded.

It was strongly contended before your committee that the case under consideration falls fairly within this equitable principle; because it was said that all the State officers and judges of North Carolina had been elected while under disability imposed by the fourteenth amendment, and Congress had subsequent to their election removed their disabilities and enabled them to hold their offices; and your committee were referred to the act of June 25, 1868 (15 Statutes at Large, 366), by which "all officers elected at the election commencing the 4th day of February, 1868, in the State of Alabama," and who had not publicly declined to accept the offices to which they were elected, were relieved of their disabilities. From these facts it was contended that the members of the legislature who voted for Vance might well believe, and it was said that in fact they did believe, that Congress would relieve Vance of his disability and that he would be admitted to his seat in the Senate.

This suggestion has some force, but a slight examination will show that it is rather plausible than sound. In the first place the case bears no resemblance to that supposed in the report in Yulee's case; because here there was no misapprehension as to any fact then existing. If the electors had supposed that Vance was not disqualified, though in fact he was, or had they believed that an act had already passed Congress relieving him from his disability, though such was not the case, then the electors would have acted under a misapprehension and honestly entertained the belief that Vance was eligible. But such is not the case. Every elector who voted for Vance knew that he was disqualified by the fourteenth amendment, and that his disability had not been removed. Every elector therefore knew when he gave his vote for Vance that, as the case then stood, such vote was thrown away. As well might a man claim exemption from the penalty imposed by a statute upon the ground that although he knew he was violating its provisions he expected the legislature would repeal it. It was the duty of that legislature to elect a Senator who, in virtue of that election, and without the aid of any other government, would be authorized to demand his seat as a Senator. To elect a disqualified candidate, and then refer it to Congress to remove his disqualifications or not, is to transfer the election from the legislature to Congress. In such case the legislature would in effect be nominating a Senator and submitting it to Congress to determine whether or not he should be a Senator. Put the case in the strongest possible light for Vance, still it must be admitted that the electors who voted for him knew that as the case then stood their votes were being thrown away; that without the action of Congress, which might or might not be interposed, the election was in violation of the Constitution; and up to the time when Abbott claimed his seat in this body, and up to the present hour, the votes given for Vance remain wholly inoperative, void, blanks in the law, thrown away for every legal purpose. Mistakes which equity may relieve against are mistakes in regard to existing facts—not oversanguine and unfounded hopes looking to the future for realization and accomplishment.

In the second place, the legislation of Congress in regard to the organization of the reconstructed governments of the Southern States furnishes no precedent to bind the Senate in determining the election of its own members. Those State governments could not be organized without relieving the disabilities of those who had been elected. Congress was therefore compelled to do so or abandon those States to anarchy or remit them to military rule. To quote the language of a great statesman on another subject: "A doubtful precedent should not be followed beyond its necessity." No such necessity exists in regard to the Senate of the United States; and therefore the electors had no right to assume that Congress would do in this case where there was no necessity for it what it had been compelled to do in the other cases referred to. And in no case has a Senator elected under disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment been relieved of such disability and permitted to take his seat.

Several decisions of the House of Representatives have been referred to, which are supposed to be inconsistent with the principle here asserted. But it is believed that in none of those cases was it established that the electors knew of the disqualification of the candidate voted for; and in the very able report of Mr. Dawes, from the Committee on Elections (Rep. of Committees, 11, 2d sess. 40th Cong.), which is much relied upon, it is expressly stated that this point was not involved because it did not appear that the electors had such notice.

But there are many reasons for declining a critical examination of the decisions of the other House in regard to the election of its members. By the Constitution, each House is made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. It would therefore be improper for the Senate—certainly indelicate for a committee of the Senate—to criticise the actions or decisions of the House; and it would be subversive of the Constitution because it would practically make the House of Representatives not only the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, but also of the members of this House, if the Senate were to follow as precedents the decisions of the House in conflict with its own opinions.

Again, there is much force and reason in the distinction made by the court, in Commonwealth vs. Cluley (56 Penn. St., 274), between a popular election, under our system of almost universal suffrage, for a member of the House of Representatives, by ballot, and an election of a Senator by a viva voce vote of the members of a legislature. And it might well be that the House of Representatives should establish one rule appropriate to the election of its members, and the Senate a different rule in regard to the election of its members. The difference between the two cases would justify different rules.

In a popular election, by ballot, for a member of the House of Representatives, where the voters are numerous and scattered over a considerable territory, it would be impossible to ascertain whether or not the electors, or enough of them to change the result, had knowledge of the disqualification of the candidate. Besides, voting by ballot includes the right of the elector to conceal the fact for which candidate he voted. This is his secret, which cannot be wrested from him even in a court of justice. And they who voted against the successful candidate, yet failed to defeat him at the polls, might attempt to accomplish the same end by pretending to have voted for him with knowledge of his incapacity. Even perjury in such case, should a voter voluntarily swear falsely in regard to it, could never be detected and punished. Such a principle applied to such elections would be unsatisfactory, often incapable of application, and always a temptation to frauds and perjuries, which might be committed with impunity. And it may be conceded that, in determining who has been elected at such popular election by ballot, no candidate not receiving a majority of all votes cast, counting blanks and ballots for disqualified candidates, ought to be declared elected; and that the decisions of the House of Representatives, as applied to the election of its own members, ought to proceed upon a different principle than the one here contended for.

But the circumstances which may well induce the House of Representatives to depart from the ancient rule and practice in determining the election of its members do not exist in relation to the election of Senators. Senators are elected by a small number of persons, the number fixed by law, who are compelled to vote viva voce. Their votes are matters of record, and the record discloses who voted for and who voted against the disqualified candidate. Whether these electors had notice or not of the ineligibility of a candidate is easily, and may be definitely and certainly, ascertained. There is no inconvenience, no opportunity for fraud, no temptation to perjury, in the application of the principle here contended for to such an election. Every reason that can be given for excluding the application of this principle to popular elections by ballot sustains its application to the election of a Senator by the viva voce vote of the members of the legislature; and it is worthy of remark that the rule of parliamentary and common law, which is established by an unbroken current of decisions in England, had reference to elections, not by ballot, but viva voce. That method of election gave rise to the rule, and no reason has been given, none suggests itself, for departing from it now in regard to such elections. And it should also be observed that in every case in the American courts of law where the judges have, obiter dictum, declared that the minority candidate was not elected, not only was the element of knowledge of the disqualification wanting, but the election was by ballot, and not viva voce. Not a dictum of any American court, or American law-writer of established reputation, has been cited to your committee, and it is believed that none exist, which disapproves of the principle as applicable to elections viva voce.

In the report of the majority it is said that this principle belongs to a government where, as in England, the right to vote has been granted or conceded as a boon or franchise by the monarch to his subject; and hence to vote for a candidate known to be disqualified is a crime. But that in this country voting is the inherent right of every citizen; and Roe on Elections, page 256, is cited as sustaining this assertion in relation to elections in England. The author referred to, so far from sustaining such a distinction, does not allude to it. And it is believed, for many reasons, that no such distinction can be maintained.

(1) The great charter in England was not a concession in the sense of a grant of rights. It was an admission that certain rights belonged to Englishmen, and always had belonged to them. The rights there admitted to exist were the inherent rights of Englishmen. Blackstone says:

"The great charter 'contained very few new grants, but, as Sir Edward Coke observes, was, for the most part, declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental laws of England.'"

The great bill of rights delivered by the Lords and Commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange February 13, 1688, and afterward enacted in Parliament, after enumerating the privileges of the people, concludes in the following strain of ancient, manly eloquence:

"And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties."

And the act of Parliament recognizes—

"All and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration to be true, ancient, and indubitable rights of the people of this kingdom."

(2) The right of voting in this country is not an inherent right of the citizen. If it were, women as well as men could vote; because women as well as men are citizens, and always have been under our Constitution; and every inherent right of the citizen is possessed as fully, and may be exercised as freely, by the female as the male citizen. Our popular elections are participated in by those who have a constitutional right to vote. Their right to vote does not spring merely from citizenship; it is a right secured, limited, and regulated by the Constitution and laws. A citizen has no more inherent right to be a voter than to be a Senator. The citizen may vote if the Constitution and laws permit, not otherwise; so every citizen may be a Senator if duly elected and qualified, not otherwise.

(3) But if such distinction were conceded to exist, it would strengthen the conclusion here arrived at. To test this, let us concede that the Englishman, in voting, is exercising not an inherent right, but a franchise delegated to him by the Crown; therefore it is a crime for him to vote for a disqualified candidate, and for that reason his vote is considered as thrown away, and the next highest qualified candidate is to be considered as elected. And let us also concede that at a popular election in this country the voter exercises an inherent right of citizenship; and hence, if he votes for a candidate known to be disqualified, his vote is not thrown away. From these admissions what results? Simply this: That in our popular elections, by ballot, for a member of the House of Representatives, the principle here contended for does not apply. Very well. It does not apply upon this hypothesis, because the voter is exercising an inherent right, and not a delegated power, when he casts his ballot. Now, if this distinction be well taken, does not every one perceive that the principle here contended for must apply to an election of Senators by the members of a legislature, who, in that election, are exercising a delegated power, and not an inherent right? The members of the legislature, in electing a Senator, are exercising a power that is delegated in a double sense. The power to elect a Senator is delegated by this Government—that is, by the Constitution of the United States—to the legislature of the State; and the people elect members of that legislature, who are, among other things, to exercise this power of electing a Senator. It will not be pretended that a member of the legislature in voting for a Senator is exercising an inherent right of a citizen, and all must admit that he is exercising a delegated power; so that the very argument which exempts the election of members of the House of Representatives from the operation of the principle under consideration subjects the election of Senators to its full operation.

It has also been urged before your committee that bills passed by Congress to relieve disabilities of members elected to the House of Representatives rest upon principles inconsistent with the conclusions of this report. To this two answers may be made: 1. The proceedings of Congress in relation to cases of election while reconstruction of the late rebel States was in progress can hardly be relied upon as settling principles by which either House of Congress ought to be bound in times of peace. The circumstances under which such legislation was had were exceptional, and the legislation itself ought not to stand as a precedent. 2. The bills which have passed were bills originating in the House of Representatives concerning members elected to that House, and although the Senate has concurred in the enactment of such laws it ought not to be regarded as settling principles by which the Senate must be bound in determining the election of its own members. Whenever the House of Representatives manifests its desire to seat a member, although it may require the enactment of a law by both Houses to accomplish the purpose, still the Senate in concurring in such enactment may be regarded as extending a courtesy to the House of Representatives rather than settling principles which will bind the Senate in relation to the election of its own members.

To recapitulate, in regard to the precise legal question involved in this case, viz, whether in an election viva voce the votes cast for a candidate known by the electors when they gave their votes to be disqualified are to be considered as thrown away and the qualified candidate next on the poll is to be declared elected, we have in favor of such a principle:

1. The uniform and unbroken current of decisions in the British Parliament from the earliest to the present time.

2. The unanimous voice of the English courts of law.

3. The express and well-considered decision of the supreme court of the State of Indiana in the case of Gulick vs. New (14 Ind. Rep., 927), and the case of Carson vs. McPhetridge (15 Ind. Rep., 327), applying the rule even to a popular election.

4. The authority of Cushing's Lex Parliamentaria, the best American work on the subject; Wilson's Digest of Parliamentary Law; Angell and Ames on Corporations, a work of standard authority; the precedent of the legislature of Massachusetts even in regard to a popular election of its members (vide Cushing's Reports of Contested Election Cases in Massachusetts, page 499; and another case, same report, 576).

And opposed to this principle in regard to an election viva voce we have absolutely nothing. Not a writer, English or American, not a decision of any court or dictum of any judge in either country has been cited condemning or denying this principle in regard to such an election; and, on the contrary, the court, in Com. vs. Cluley (56 Penn. St., 270), which is relied on as being opposed, expressly recognize and indorse this principle when applied to elections viva voce by a limited number of electors.

The cases which have been cited from the American reports and are relied upon as being opposed to this principle all related to popular elections by ballot, and not to elections viva voce. Yet even in those cases the element of knowledge that the candidate was disqualified did not exist, and therefore all that is said about it in those cases is obiter dicta.

A declaration from the bench is obiter dictum, and not binding as authority when it was unnecessary to a decision of the case in which it was made.

To illustrate, the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case (19 Howard, 393), first determined that the circuit court of the United States had no jurisdiction in the case. That ended the matter. The decision of the court below had to be reversed for that reason. It was therefore obiter dictum for the court to proceed to decide questions which, decided either way, would not affect the judgment to be pronounced. Had the court in that case held that the Missouri compromise, so called, was constitutional, yet the decision, that is, the judgment, would have been the same.

The true rule upon this subject is given by Vaughan, C. J. (Vaughan, 382), as follows:

"An opinion given in court, if not necessary to the judgment given of record, but that it might have been as well given if no such or a contrary opinion had been broached, is no judicial opinion, nor more than a gratis dictum. But an opinion, though erroneous, concluding to the judgment, is a judicial opinion," &c.

To the same effect see Heath, J., in Hutchinson vs. Birch, 4 Taunton, 625; Pittstown vs. Plattsburg, 18 Johnson, 418.

Therefore all that was said by the judges in the American cases cited, which cases did not involve the element of knowledge of the incapacity of the candidate, is obiter dicta. But were it otherwise, and had those decisions been made in cases which showed that the disqualification of the candidate was known to the elector, still the fact that they relate only to popular elections by ballot would render them wholly inapplicable to the case now before the Senate.

Therefore it is submitted that upon reason and authority the votes cast for Mr. Vance, with full knowledge on the part of the members of both houses of the legislature that he was disqualified by the Constitution to serve in this body, ought to be considered as thrown away; and that, inasmuch as a majority of all the members elected to each house were "actually present," the election was legal, and that the qualified candidate receiving the highest number of votes, and a majority of all votes cast for qualified candidates, was duly elected. It is conceded that majorities have a constitutional right to govern in this country; but it is not conceded that even the majority of the legislature of a State may morally or constitutionally defeat government by refusing to elect Senators to serve in the Senate of the United States. In this case the majority had a right to elect a qualified person to the Senate; but, having waived their right by voting for a person known to be disqualified, as much as though they had refused to vote at all, or had voted for a man known to be dead, the minority who complied with the Constitution by voting for a qualified candidate may well be held to have expressed the will of the legislature. If the majority, being called upon, will not vote, they cannot complain that the election was decided by those who did vote, though a minority of the elective body. And voting for a person known to be disqualified is not voting. Such votes are void—no votes; and the highest number of votes cast, a quorum being present, must effect an election.

Therefore, in view of the premises, the minority of your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott has been duly elected Senator from the State of North Carolina for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator.

MATT. H. CARPENTER,
B. F. RICE,
Minority of Committee.

THURSDAY, April 11, 1872.

On motion by Mr. Logan, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

"Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, not having received a majority of the votes cast by the North Carolina legislature on the second Tuesday in November, 1870, for the office of Senator of the United States, is not entitled to a seat in said United States Senate as such Senator."

On motion by Mr. Carpenter to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That Joseph C. Abbott has been duly elected Senator from the State of North Carolina for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator,"

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Edmunds (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes) the Senate adjourned.

[The debate, including a speech by Mr. Logan, is found on pages 219–229 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note.]

FRIDAY, April 12, 1872.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 2387–2390 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. Mr. Carpenter's speech is found on pages 245–257 of the Appendix referred to in the head-note.]

MONDAY, April 15, 1872.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on pages 2431–2434 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. Mr. Thurman's speech is found on pages 234–245 of the Appendix referred to in the head-note.]

MONDAY, April 22, 1872.

The Senate resumed, &c.

[The debate is found on page 2639 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. Mr. Pool's speech is found on pages 272–279 of the Appendix referred to in the head-note.]

TUESDAY, April 23, 1872.

The Vice-President announced that the morning hour had expired, and called up the unfinished business of the Senate at its last adjournment, viz, the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections declaring Joseph C. Abbott not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of North Carolina; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the said resolution.

* * * * * * *

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Carpenter to amend the resolution, viz: Strike out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof insert:

"That Joseph C. Abbott has been duly elected Senator from the State of North Carolina for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator,"

After debate,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 42.

On motion by Mr. Carpenter, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Ames, Chandler, Cragin, Gilbert, Howe, Nye, Osborn, Patterson, Pool, and Sawyer.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Blair, Buckingham, Caldwell, Cameron, Casserly, Clayton, Cooper, Davis of West Virginia, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Hill, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Sumner, Thurman, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, West, Windom, and Wright.

So the motion was not agreed to; and

On the question to agree to the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was

Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, not having receiveda majority of the votes cast by the North Carolina legislature on the second Tuesday in November, 1870, for the office of Senator of the United States, is not entitled to a seat in said United States Senate as such Senator.

[The debate is found on page 2676 of the Congressional Globe referred to in the head-note. Mr. Carpenter's speech is found on pages 328–334 of the Appendix referred to in the head-note.]

COMPENSATION OF MR. ABBOTT.

WEDNESDAY, April 24, 1872.

Mr. Morton, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported the following resolution; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent:

"Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, late contestant for a seat in this body from the State of North Carolina, be allowed his salary from 4th of March, 1871, up to the 23d of April, 1872, and one mileage each way."

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read the third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass.

CREDENTIALS OF MR. RANSOM.

MONDAY, February 5, 1872.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of Matt W. Ransom, elected a Senator by the legislature of the State of North Carolina for the unexpired portion of the term commencing March 4, 1871; which were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

WEDNESDAY, April 24, 1872.

Mr. Morton, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Matt W. Ransom, elected a Senator by the legislature of North Carolina for the term of six years commencing March 4, 1871, reported that upon examination the committee had found that the credentials were in due form, and recommended that Mr. Ransom be admitted to a seat in the Senate;

Whereupon
